TAYLOR et ux. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. et al. (L. A. 3424.)(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1916.
Rehearing Denied June 22, 1916.)1. NEW TRIAL ⇨163(2)—ORDER—FINALITY.

An order granting a new trial to plaintiff was final as to a defendant who did not appeal therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 331; Dec. Dig. ⇨163(2).]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1089(5)—REVIEW—REASONS FOR DECISION—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where the giving of an instruction did not constitute a proper ground for granting a new trial, as held by the District Court of Appeal affirming an order of the superior court granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, the Supreme Court will consider the other grounds relied upon by plaintiff in its motion for a new trial.

3. STREET RAILROADS ⇨110(1)—INJURY ON TRACK—PLEADING—NEGLIGENCE.

A count in an action for damages for personal injuries resulting from a collision between defendant's street car and an automobile driven by the plaintiff, charging that defendant willfully, wantonly, and recklessly propelled its car at a high and dangerous rate of speed along the street and against the automobile with knowledge of plaintiff's peril and that defendant could, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, have avoided injuring the plaintiff, was not based upon negligence, but stated a cause of action based upon willful wrong and injury.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1061(3)—HARMLESS ERROR—NONSUIT—SEPARATE COUNT.

In such case, error, if any, in granting a nonsuit as to such count was without injury, where everything which could have been claimed for the plaintiff thereunder was included in and disposed of by the trial, in which evidence of the alleged willful act was received and an instruction on the doctrine on the last clear chance given.

5. STREET RAILROADS ⇨118(3)—INJURY ON TRACK—INSTRUCTIONS—NEGLIGENCE.

Where there was some testimony tending to show that after the motorman and the plaintiff were in sight of each other and when the collision was impending the motorman rang his bell, an instruction for defendant that if the plaintiff saw the car while he was in a place of safety and by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the collision, it was immaterial whether the bell on the car was rung, as the only purpose of ringing it would be to give knowledge of the car's approach, was not dealing with the last clear chance doctrine, and was not objectionable by reason of the use of the words "at any time," and the word "only," since such words would not prevent the jury from inferring that the motorman knew of plaintiff's danger and could have avoided the collision by stopping the car in the exercise of ordinary care instead of using the time in needlessly ringing the bell.

6. TRIAL ⇨260(8)—REQUESTED INSTRUCTION—GIVEN INSTRUCTION.

In an action for injuries from the collision of a street car with plaintiff's automobile, the refusal of plaintiff's instruction that a motorman operating an electric street car in a populous and traveled part of a city on approaching a street crossing at a rapid rate of speed was required to give reasonable notice of his approach, was not error, where the court instructed that it was the duty of a motorman in the populous part of a city to keep a close lookout and use such reasonable precautions at crossings where his view was obstructed as the circumstances required.

7. STREET RAILROADS ⇨118(11)—INJURIES AT CROSSING—INSTRUCTION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

In such action, an instruction that if defendant was negligent and thereby caused some mistake, fright, or loss of mind on the part of the plaintiff, yet if plaintiff was himself negligent and thereby proximately contributed to his fright, etc., so that their mutual negligence continued up to the time of the collision and proximately caused it, there could be no recovery, was erroneous, as depriving the plaintiff of his right to be excused from responsibility for acts done by him solely through his fright under the circumstances of sudden danger, even though his original negligence was not a direct or proximate cause of the injury.

8. STREET RAILROADS ⇨102(2)—INJURIES AT CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

If plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributing to the collision and operating continuously up to the time of the collision, there could be no recovery, even though the defendant or its motorman might have been negligent.

9. TRIAL ⇨200—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF JURY.

In an action for personal injuries from a collision of a street car with plaintiff's automobile, where the testimony of the motorman placed the car at about 150 feet from the point of the collision when he cut off the power, and the testimony of plaintiff placed it at about the same distance when he first observed it, the words "at any time" in an instruction that if by the exercise of ordinary care plaintiff could have avoided the collision, it was immaterial whether the bell on the car was rung as its "only" purpose would be to give notice of the car's approach did not invade the province of the jury, since the ringing of the bell in such circumstances was immaterial, and had no cause or connection with the accident.

10. STREET RAILROADS ⇨102(1)—INJURIES ON TRACK—LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

In such action, the effect of the application of the doctrine of last clear chance would be to eliminate from consideration all questions as to the proximate cause of the plaintiff's peril; for, if the motorman had actual knowledge of such peril, and by the exercise of ordinary care had an opportunity to avoid the accident, but negligently failed to do so, such negligence would be the proximate cause of the injury, making defendant liable.

11. STREET RAILROADS ⇨118(15)—INJURIES AT CROSSING—INSTRUCTION—CONSTRUCTION.

An instruction that if the plaintiff's automobile was moving at less than 15 miles per hour when it turned toward an approaching car and the motorman then saw it, and if such an automobile could in the exercise of ordinary care be turned at such speed and place without swinging over the track, the motorman might assume that it would not swing over the track and was not bound to apply the brakes or attempt to stop the car until, in the exercise of ordinary care, he became aware that it would not clear the track, was addressed to the situation existing before the motorman became aware or should have become aware that plaintiff had negligently placed himself in a perilous position, and was not an instruction on the doctrine of last clear chance, but applied a general rule of negligence to facts independent of that doctrine.

12. STREET RAILROADS ☞81(1)—OPERATION—NEGLIGENCE.

The law does not require a higher degree of care of a motorman than is required of other users of the public streets, and the reasonable care which is required must be measured by all the conditions, rights, and circumstances of each particular case.

13. STREET RAILROADS ☞90(4)—OPERATION—NEGLIGENCE—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

The mere fact that a motorman sees an automobile does not require him to take added precautions to avert a collision, but to require such precautions it is essential that he should have seen that it was in a position of danger, and, as he might assume that it would stop before coming to the track, such realization of danger would arise only when it appeared either that the automobile was being driven in ignorance or disregard of the possibility of meeting an approaching car, or that it had gotten so near the track that it could not be stopped.

14. STREET RAILROADS ☞118(15)—INJURIES ON TRACK—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where plaintiffs requested instruction that if the motorman saw, or ought to have seen, the automobile in a place of peril it was his duty to use ordinary and reasonable effort to have his car under control, and that the motorman's care was measured by the dangers of the situation, treated as intended to cover the doctrine of last clear chance, was properly modified by omitting the words "or in the exercise of reasonable care ought to see."

15. TRIAL ☞296(4, 5) — INSTRUCTION — OMISSIONS—SUPPLY BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

Treating such instruction as not presenting the doctrine of last clear chance, the omission of such words was not error, where the omission was supplied by other instructions.

16. APPEAL AND ERROR ☞1066—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where it was not questioned but that the motorman actually saw the approach of the automobile in time to act, the omission of such words, "or in the exercise of reasonable care ought to see," from an instruction, was not prejudicial.

17. TRIAL ☞295(1) — CONSTRUING INSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

In determining whether a jury has been properly instructed as to the law, the instructions taken as a whole must be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703, 704, 713, 714, 717; Dec. Dig. ☞ 295(1).]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by Robbins B. Taylor and wife against the Pacific Electric Railway Company and R. Middleton. Verdict for defendant corporation. From an order granting a new trial, defendant corporation appealed. The District Court of Appeal affirmed the order of the Superior Court. On application for hearing in the Supreme Court granted, and order affirmed.

J. W. McKinley, R. C. Gortner, and Frank Karr, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Leonard B. Slosson, of Los Angeles, and Clayton B. Taylor, of Pasadena, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This court granted the application of the defendant corporation for a hearing after decision in the District Court of Appeal for the Second District, which affirmed the order of the superior court granting the plaintiffs' motion for a new trial. The hearing was granted because of the conclusions reached by the District Court of Appeal in regard to instructions Nos. 7 and 31, given to the jury, and which shall be presently considered. The rest of the opinion, which we hereby approve and adopt, is as follows:

"This is an appeal from an order granting plaintiffs' motion for a new trial. The complaint is in two counts and the plaintiffs prosecute this action to recover damages for personal injuries received by them, resulting from a collision between a street car of the defendant company and an automobile owned and driven by the plaintiff Robbins B. Taylor. Further demand is made on account of expenditures incidental to the personal injuries received and on account of damages to the automobile. The first count of the complaint charges that the defendants negligently and carelessly propelled their street car at a high, dangerous, and unsafe rate of speed along the street and upon and against the automobile. The second count is like the first, except that, instead of charging negligence upon the part of the defendants, it charges that the defendants willfully, wantonly, and recklessly propelled their street car at a high and dangerous rate of speed along said street and against said automobile, and that this was done by defendants with knowledge of plaintiffs' peril and the car was so propelled after defendants, knowing of the danger to plaintiffs, could with the exercise of ordinary diligence have avoided injuring plaintiffs. The answer, after denying the several allegations of the complaint in which the plaintiffs' causes of action are set forth, also alleges facts constituting the defense of contributory negligence.

[1] "At the close of the evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiffs, defendants moved for judgment of nonsuit on the ground that there was no proof establishing or tending to establish any negligence on the part of the defendants or either of them, and on the further ground that the proof affirmatively established contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs directly and proximately contributing to the accident. The motion was granted as to the second cause of action and denied as to the first cause of action. Thereafter, the cause having been submitted to the jury upon the first cause of action, their verdict was returned in favor of the defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly, in favor of the defendant railway company. The defendant Middleton, who was the motorman operating said street car, was ignored in the judgment and we shall not further refer to him as a party to the action. The order granting a new trial is final as to Middleton, since he did not appeal therefrom. The notice of appeal is given by and on behalf of 'the defendant.' Counsel on both sides by their briefs have assumed that the defendant referred to in the notice of appeal is the defendant railway company, and we make the same assumption.

[2] "The motion of plaintiffs for a new trial was based upon several assignments of error covering the order granting the motion for nonsuit and several alleged errors in giving, and others in refusing, instructions to the jury. The order granting the motion for new trial is as follows: 'It is ordered that the said motion be, and it is hereby granted on the ground of error committed by the court in giving instruction No. 20, requested by defendant.' Since it is our opinion, as hereinafter stated, that the giving of instruction No. 20 did not constitute a proper ground for granting a new trial, it is our duty to also consider the other grounds relied upon by plaintiffs in their motion for a new trial. Weisser v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 427, 83 Pac. 439, 7 Ann. Cas. 636.

"On July 16, 1911, the plaintiff R. B. Taylor, and his wife, the plaintiff Angie L. Taylor, with three other persons, were traveling west on Sunset boulevard in the city of Los Angeles in an automobile belonging to Mr. Taylor and were approaching Highland avenue. Mr. Taylor was driving the machine at a speed of a little under 15 miles per hour. At that time a street car of the defendant company was coming north on Highland avenue approaching Sunset boulevard. The view of the plaintiffs southward on Highland avenue was obstructed by buildings and trees until they approached close to the east line of Highland avenue. R. B. Taylor was 'just a trifle' hard of hearing. The car tracks on Highland avenue were laid in the street as a double-track system, but for some reason the east track was not then in use, and the street car was coming north on the left-hand or westerly track. Mr. Taylor slowed down when he reached a point about 75 feet from the railroad tracks and listened, but heard nothing and saw nothing. He slowed up the machine and pushed out the main clutch so as to shut off the power, then hit the clutch in and almost immediately, looking to the southwest, saw the car coming up Highland avenue. He jerked his wheel around, endeavoring to turn his automobile to the north to go up Highland avenue. Testifying he said: 'I put one foot on the brake, and one foot—threw off the power, but I cannot say whether I did or not. * * * Now, whether I took a second turn or not I cannot tell; I do not remember; I do not know, but I know it curved around to the right, and I think the left front wheel had either got up close to the track the car was coming on—possibly the front wheel had passed over it a little, but I was running north practically, but at a little angle to the west.' The car struck the automobile and, according to some of the testimony, carried it along Highland avenue 81 feet from the point of collision before the car stopped. Taylor also testified that when about 50 feet from the east rail of the track on which the street car was running, he was traveling at about 12 miles an hour; that at that point he jerked his wheel so as to turn his automobile to the right as quickly as he could on seeing the car approaching at 'terrific speed.' * * * 'I do not think I took a second turn on the control wheel, very likely. I cannot explain it any other way.' The street car was going upgrade. 'I intended to shut off the power; whether I did so or not, I do not know. * * * My foot may have missed it as I went to put it down. It was pretty exciting time.' Again he said: 'The bell had not been rung on that car when I saw it. I am absolutely certain of that; at least, I did not hear it, and I think I would have heard it, because I was watching for it. * * * I will swear I did not hear—I think I did hear it when I got on Sunset boulevard. I think under normal conditions I could have made the turn all right. If I had not got excited, I could have stopped my automobile in 15 feet at the outside, at the rate I was going, if my purpose had been to stop the automobile, or if my foot had struck the—cut off the power—I could not tell, I did the best I could; God knows. If I had not missed the clutch I could have stopped; I did the best I could under the circumstances.' Recalled for further testimony, Taylor said: 'I do not think I could have stopped in 12 or 15 feet. I do not know; I never tried. I think under normal conditions I could have stopped within 50 feet.'

"Mrs. Taylor testified: 'As we approached Highland avenue, I saw a car after my husband had commenced to turn the automobile, and it was coming at a terrific speed. * * * I was in the rear seat behind my husband. * * * I did not hear any bell prior to that time. * * * The bell may have rung, but I did not hear any bell at all.' Several witnesses testified to the fact that no bell was rung on the street car as it approached Sunset boulevard, and that the car was traveling at a very great speed, variously described as 'terrific,' 'fast,' 'very fast,' 'swiftly.'

[3, 4] "It may be doubted whether the second count of the complaint is based upon negligence at all; rather than that, it seems to state a cause of action based upon willful wrong and injury. It was so held in the somewhat similar case of Tognazzini v. Freeman, 18 Cal. App. 468, 123 Pac. 540, where the action arose out of a collision between automobiles. But if the second count be construed as one stating a cause of action arising out of willful, wanton, and reckless negligence, and if in that view the nonsuit should not have been granted, it follows that the error was without injury for the reason that everything which could have been claimed for the plaintiffs under that count and on that theory of the case was equally well included in and disposed of by the trial which proceeded to completion as a trial on the issues raised by the first count of the complaint and the answer thereto. The only wanton, willful or negligent acts of the defendants which the plaintiffs' evidence tended to show, consisted in violations of the duty of the motorman to use due care to avoid injury to the plaintiffs after he discovered that they were or were about to place themselves in a place of danger. With respect to such situation the evidence was received and the jury was fully instructed thereon, and those instructions covered what is known as the doctrine of the 'last clear chance' to avoid impending danger.

[5] "We have stated the fact that the court in granting plaintiffs' motion for new trial did so specifically on the ground of error committed in giving instruction No. 20, requested by the defendant. This instruction was as follows: 'I charge you that if from the evidence you believe that the said Robbins B. Taylor saw the defendant's said car while he was still in a place of safety and that by the exercise of ordinary care, such as would have been exercised by a reasonable person under the circumstances, either in applying the brakes on said automobile, or in turning the same, he could have avoided the said collision, then it becomes immaterial in this case whether or not the bell on said car was rung at any time, for the only purpose of ringing the bell would be to give knowledge of the car's approach, which knowledge the said Robbins B. Taylor in that event would already have obtained by seeing it.' Counsel for respondents make no criticism on the wording of this instruction, except the use of the words 'at any time,' and (in the following clause) 'only,' near the end of the sentence. They claim that by the use of these words the jury were prevented from drawing the inference from the testimony, if they were so disposed, 'that the motorman knew of the respondents' danger and could have avoided the collision by stopping the car in the exercise of the ordinary care required of him in such a situation, instead of using the precious seconds in the useless procedure of ringing the bell.' There was some testimony tending to show that after the motorman and the plaintiffs were in sight of each other and when the collision was impending, the motorman rang his bell. They contend that by reason of the error above noted in instruction No. 20 they were deprived of the benefit of the rule requiring the defendants to duly utilize their last clear chance to avoid the collision. The answer to this contention is that the instruction in question was not dealing with that phase of the case relating to the doctrine of last clear chance; that the doctrine mentioned was fully discussed in other instructions given by the court; and that there is no reasonable probability that the jury would put upon the instruction as stated the strained construction insisted upon by the respondents.

[6] "The plaintiffs offered and the court refused to give the following instruction: 'It is the duty of a motorman operating an electric street car in a populous section or much traveled portion of the city, on approaching a street crossing at a rapid rate of speed, to give reasonable warning of his approach.' Instruction No. 25, as given by the court, closes as follows: 'It is the duty of a motorman while operating an electric street car in a populous or much used portion of a city to keep a close lookout and he should use such reasonable precautions at crossings where his view is obstructed, as the circumstances require, and it is negligence on his part not to so do.' In view of the instruction given, we think that respondents were not injured by the refusal of the instruction asked for by them.

"The objection of respondents to instruction No. 3 manifestly refers to a clerical error which cannot reasonably be supposed to have misled the jury.

[7, 8] "Instruction No. 18, given at request of the defendant, reads as follows: 'If you find from the evidence that defendants were negligent in the commission or omission of some act, and that thereby said defendants caused some mistake, fright, or loss of presence of mind on the part of said Robbins B. Taylor, still I instruct you that if the said Robbins B. Taylor was himself negligent, and by such negligence on his part contributed directly or proximately to a mistake, fright, or loss of presence of mind on his part, and that thereby by the mutual fault both of said Taylor and said defendants operating and continuing up to the time of the collision the said accident directly and proximately resulted, then no recovery can be had herein and your verdict must be for the defendants. It is the law, as stated in instruction No. 23, that if the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, 'and if such negligence on his part contributed directly or proximately to the collision, and operated continuously up to the time of the collision, there can be no recovery, even though the defendant company or motorman may have been negligent.' But this instruction No. 18 attempts to transmute a more remote cause of the accident into a proximate cause and to deprive the plaintiff of the right to be excused from responsibility for acts done by him solely through his condition of fright under the circumstances of sudden danger. In substance it is a statement that if the mutual negligence of plaintiff and defendant has created a dangerous emergency, and if through sudden fright or loss of presence of mind the plaintiff makes a mistake which prevents him from escaping the danger and injury, then as a necessary legal consequence he shall be responsible for the mistake so made, and this shall be considered as negligence proximately causing the injury, even though his original negligence was not a direct or proximate cause of the injury. The instruction is complicated, misleading, and wrong."

[9] Before discussing instructions Nos. 7 and 31 the suggestion may be added to the comment of the District Court of Appeal in regard to instruction No. 20, that while the expression "at any time" might, under other circumstances, be improper, still under the testimony here it was not susceptible of misconstruction and did not invade the province of the jury. The testimony of the motorman would place the car about 150 feet from the point of the collision when he cut off the power. He testifies that it was at this juncture he rang the bell. The version of Mr. Taylor places the car about the same distance away when he first observed it. So that "at any time" is confined to the space intervening between Mr. Taylor's first view of the car and the collision. Assuming, therefore, in favor of the facts as stated in the instruction, the ringing of the bell was immaterial and had no causal connection with the accident itself. Lambert v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 146 Cal. 231, 79 Pac. 873; Starck v. Pacific Electric Co., 156 Pac. 51. This also disposes of the objection to the word "only" used in connection with the purpose of ringing the bell.

"If you believe from the evidence that the said automobile was moving at a rate of speed less than 15 miles per hour at the time the said Robbins B. Taylor turned it toward the right, and that the motorman then saw such automobile and the turn that was being given it, and if you further believe from the evidence that an automobile of that class and make could easily, by the exercise of ordinary care, be turned at said speed and at said place without swinging over in the vicinity of or in dangerous proximity to said track on which said car was running, then I instruct you that the said motorman had a right to assume that the said automobile would continue to swing to the right and would not come into dangerous proximity to said car, and said motorman was under no obligation to apply the brakes or to attempt to stop the said car until such time as he became aware, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have become aware, of the fact that said automobile would not succeed in making the said turn or would come in dangerous proximity to said car. If you believe from the evidence that said automobile was about 40 feet from the said track when the said Robbins B. Taylor saw defendant's car, and that said automobile was running at a speed of 15 miles per hour or less, and that an automobile of the said class, and make, running at such speed, could be stopped by the exercise of ordinary care before reaching said tracks or before coming in dangerous proximity thereto, then I instruct you that the motorman had a right to assume that the said automobile, if going at said rate of speed, would be stopped before going upon said track or in dangerous proximity thereto, and was under no obligation to retard or brake his said car because of the presence of such automobile until he became aware or in the exercise of ordinary care should have become aware, that said automobile would not stop before getting into dangerous proximity to said track."

Respondents, relying upon Harrington v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85, a case involving the doctrine of the last clear chance, contend that the instruction "was erroneous and prejudicial to plaintiffs for the reason that the motorman was thereby relieved from the obligation to exercise care until he had knowledge, or in the exercise of reasonable care should have had knowledge, that the respondents were not going to be able to avoid the collision, whereas the law requires that the motorman should have exercised due care where the circumstances were such as to convey to the mind of a reasonable man a question as to whether respondents would or would not be able to avoid the collision, notwithstanding respondents were placed in that position by their own negligence." The District Court of Appeal, approving of this contention, held that the instruction was erroneous as "in substance it required the jury to assume that the motorman need not attempt to stop his car unless he knew the collision was inevitable."

But we do not think that the instruction purports to cover the doctrine of the last clear chance, for it omits the necessary element of liability. The effect of the application of that doctrine would be to eliminate from consideration all question as to the proximate cause of the perilous situation of the plaintiffs, for if the motorman had actual knowledge of such situation, and by the exercise of ordinary care had a clear opportunity to avoid the accident, but negligently failed to prevent it, the liability of the defendants is established, and such failure is the proximate cause of the injury. Thompson v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 Pac. 709; Tucker v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 154 Pac. 835; Starck v. Pacific Electric Co., 156 Pac. 51; Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., supra; 29 Cyc. 530. The instruction rather applies a general rule of negligence to certain facts, independent of the doctrine of the last clear chance. The point to the instruction is that the motorman was under no obligation to brake or retard his car until such time as he became aware, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have become aware, that the automobile would not succeed in making the turn or stop before coming into dangerous proximity to said car. In other words, it is addressed to the situation as it existed prior to the time when the motorman became aware, or should have become aware, that the plaintiffs had negligently placed themselves in a perilous position, while the doctrine of the last clear chance has no application until after such knowledge is actually gained. The latter rule was covered by instructions Nos. 3, 9, 19, 34, and 35.

[12] So regarded, instruction No. 7 is in accord with recent authorities in this state on the general principles of negligence as applied to the facts involved in the instruction. It is well settled that the law does not require a higher degree of care of motormen operating street cars than is required of other users of the public streets, and the reasonable care which is required must be measured by all the conditions, rights, and circumstances of each particular case. Scott v. San Bernardino Valley Traction Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 Pac. 677.

[13] It was said in Thompson v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., supra:

"The duty of taking added precautions to avert a collision was not cast upon the motorman by the mere fact that he saw the automobile. It was essential, too, that he should have seen that it was in a position of danger. He had the right to assume that it would stop before coming to the track, and a realization of danger would arise only when it appeared, either that the automobile was being driven in ignorance or disregard of the possibility of meeting an approaching car, or that it had gotten so near the track that it could no longer be stopped. Holmes v. Southern Pacific C. Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 168, 31 Pac. 834; Lambert v. Southern Pacific Co., 146 Cal. 231, 236, 79 Pac. 873."

This is the general rule and finds support in Fujise v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 12 Cal. App. 207, 216, 107 Pac. 317, where the court said:

"The sum of the adjudicated cases bearing upon the relative rights of street cars and citizens traveling in vehicles drawn by horses or other animals is that both have a right to use the street, but neither has the exclusive right. The motorman of a street car is not necessarily obliged to stop his car when he sees a man driving in a vehicle along the line of a railway ahead of the car; but he may continue to run the car in a proper manner until he is conscious of the fact that the driver is unaware or heedless of his danger. * * * Seeing a man driving along the track, the motorman may assume that he will turn aside and out of the way of the car, but he cannot rest on the assumption so long as to allow his car to reach a point where it will be impossible for him to control his car or give warning in time to prevent injury to the man or vehicle."

Quoted and approved in McKenna v. Omaha & C. B. St. Ry. Co., 97 Neb. 281, 149 N. W. 826. See, also, Kramm v. Stockton Electric Ry. Co., 10 Cal. App. 271, 101 Pac. 914; Wood v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 155 Cal. 68.

Nor does the instruction assume that the motorman need not attempt to stop his car "unless he knew the collision was inevitable." The distinction between the case of an automobile being in dangerous proximity to an approaching car, and one where the collision is inevitable, is readily apparent, for in the first instance it is conceivable that the collision may still be avoided. We conclude, therefore, that the seventh instruction correctly states the law applicable to the situation to which it is addressed, and was properly given.

[14-17] The plaintiffs offered the following instruction (No. 31):

"When a motorman sees, or in the exercise of reasonable care ought to see, that an automobile is in a place of peril, either on the tracks or in a place and in motion indicating that it is about to drive on the track or is liable from its position to come in contact with the car, it is the duty of the motorman to use ordinary and reasonable effort to have his car under control, either by slackening the speed of his car or by stopping it altogether, in order to avert a possible injury, and the care and diligence required of the motorman in such an event is measured by the exigencies of the situation and the dangers surrounding at the time, if there are any."

The court omitted the words, "or in the exercise of reasonable care ought to see," which omission the respondents claim was error. The court evidently assumed that the instruction, as framed by the plaintiffs, was intended to cover the doctrine of the last clear chance and of course, in the statement of that rule, the omitted expression would have no place. But even assuming that the instruction does not involve the doctrine of the last clear chance, we cannot perceive that the elimination of the words constituted error, or, if error, that it was prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiffs. As modified, the instruction correctly states the rule applying to a case where the motorman sees that the automobile is in a place of peril, and could well have been followed by the declaration that if a motorman, in the exercise of ordinary care, should see the perilous situation of an automobile, but does not, he is nevertheless as negligent as if he does see it and fails to perform his duty in the premises. But we think this rule was called to the attention of the jury by other instructions. Instruction No. 8 contains the expression:

"If after the said automobile was seen by the said motorman to be in danger of a collision, or should, by the exercise of ordinary care by said motorman, have been seen by him. * * *"

Instruction No. 7 also recognizes the rule, and instruction No. 25 touches on the duty of a motorman operating an electric car in a populous city to keep a close lookout. Again, instruction No. 29 declares that it is as obligatory upon the motorman propelling a street car as it is upon footmen, horsemen, and drivers of automobiles to look and listen as he goes so as to be able to avoid collisions with others exercising the common privilege of using the streets. "In determining whether a jury have been properly instructed as to the law, the instructions taken as a whole must be considered." Henderson v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 150 Cal. 689, 89 Pac. 976. Finally, it is not questioned that the motorman did actually see the approach of the automobile in time to act, and hence, even if the omission was not supplied by other instructions, it cannot be held that the plaintiffs suffered any prejudice by the modification.

Order affirmed.

BASSFORD v. EARL et al. (Sac. 2203.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1916.
Rehearing Denied June 29, 1916.)

1. NEW TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 93—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—LOSS—STATUTES—MEANING OF LANGUAGE—TENSE OF WORDS.

The statute approved March 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 998), entitled "An act providing for the disposition of actions and proceedings in which bills of exceptions and statements on motion for a new trial have been lost or destroyed by conflagration or other public calamity," is retrospective and remedial in its operation, although the body of the act (section 1) reads "when any proposed bill of exceptions * * * on motion for a new trial * * * is * * * destroyed by * * * conflagration or other public calamity."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 189; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 93.]

2. NEW TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 93—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—LOSS—STATUTES—MEANING OF LANGUAGE—TENSE OF WORDS.

In such statute (section 1) the words "and it is by the court * * * deemed impossible or impracticable to restore such proceedings," have reference not to the date of destruction, but only to the date when the court hears the application authorized by the statute.

3. NEW TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 93—STATUTORY PROVISION—DILIGENCE.

Under such statute, diligence on the part of the moving party is required, as it does not excuse lack of diligence but merely delays.

4. NEW TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 93—PROCEEDINGS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under such statute death of original court reporter shortly after the fire of April, 1906, and affidavits of difficulty of transcribing his notes and conditions following the said fire, held not to show abuse of discretion in granting new trial.

5. STATUTES $\hookrightarrow$ 117(1)—TITLE—RELATING TO MORE THAN ONE SUBJECT—"BILL OF EXCEPTIONS"—"STATEMENT."

Such a statute is not unconstitutional as violating the express provisions of Const. art. 4, § 24, in embracing more than one subject, since "bills of exceptions" and "statements" do not differ in essence, but each preserves a record of proceedings in lower court for use on appeal, and are frequently considered synonymous expressions.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bill of Exceptions; Statement.]

6. STATUTES $\hookrightarrow$ 117(1)—TITLE—EXPRESSION IN TITLE OF SUBJECT.

Such statute is not unconstitutional as violating the express provisions of Const. art. 4, § 24, in not expressing its subject in its title, although its title refers to bills of exceptions and statements while the text deals with "proposed" bills and statements.

7. STATUTES $\hookrightarrow$ 105(2)—TITLE—EXPRESSION IN TITLE OF MORE THAN ONE SUBJECT.

Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that every act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, should receive a liberal construction.

8. STATUTES ☞85(1)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—CIVIL REMEDIES—REGULATION OF TIME OF NEW TRIAL.

The statute approved March 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 998), entitled "An act providing for the disposition of actions and proceedings in which bills of exceptions and statements on motion for a new trial have been lost or destroyed by conflagration or other public calamity," is not "special legislation regulating the practice in courts of justice," contrary to the express terms of Const. art. 4, § 25, though it provides a remedy for the destruction of proposed statements and bills of exceptions and none for settled bills and statements; a settled bill of exceptions being a court record for whose restoration in case of destruction other provision is made by remedial legislation of 1906 (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 73).

9. STATUTES ☞77(1)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—UNIFORMITY OF OPERATION.

A law is not special merely because it does not include within its scope all who might be benefited by such legislation.

10. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ☞169—NEW TRIAL ☞93—OBLIGATIONS OF CONTRACTS—CHANGE OF REMEDIES.

The statute approved March 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 998) entitled "An act providing for the disposition of actions and proceedings in which bills of exceptions and statements on motion for new trial have been lost or destroyed by conflagration or other public calamity," does not impair the obligation of a contract, but merely changes a remedy applicable to a pending proceeding, in which rights are not vested.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; Henry C. Gesford and R. H. Latimer, Judges.

Suit by Henry A. Bassford against Edwin T. Earl and others. From orders denying motions to dismiss plaintiff's motion for new trial, and granting new trial, defendants appeal. Order granting new trial affirmed. The remaining appeals dismissed.

William M. Cannon and Jabish Clement, both of San Francisco (Paul C. Morf, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Guy C. Earl, of San Francisco, Chauncey H. Dunn, of Sacramento, W. H. Spaulding, of San Francisco, and Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This was an action brought by Henry A. Bassford for a decree declaring that an instrument in form a deed, executed by plaintiff to Edwin T. Earl, was in fact a mortgage. The action was commenced in the latter part of 1902, and was subsequently tried before the late Judge Buckles, who, disregarding the findings of an advisory jury, entered judgment in favor of defendants on June 3, 1904. Plaintiff served notice of intention to move for a new trial, and after service of a proposed bill of exceptions and proposed amendments thereto, an effort was made to settle a bill. On June 17, 1905, by consent of the court and the attorneys, all of the papers, including the transcript of the testimony, were, on June 17, 1905, left with Wm. M. Cannon, Esq., one of plaintiff's attorneys, who took them to his office in San Francisco with the understanding that, at his leisure he would examine the proposed amendments which the court had not settled and endeavor to lighten the labors of the court and the opposing counsel by agreeing to as many of said amendments either in their original form or with suggested modifications as he felt that he could accept without prejudice to his client's case. All of the papers were destroyed in the great conflagration of April 18, 1906. On March 23, 1907, a remedial statute, which we shall presently discuss in detail, was approved, and on May 10th of the same year plaintiff served notice of his intention to move for a new trial under said statute. The motion came on for hearing before Judge Harrier, but the hearing was postponed and the matter remained undecided when Judge Harrier left the bench. Subsequently Judge Buckles, who had served for a time on the bench of the District Court of Appeal, again became judge of the superior court of Solano county. On October 16, 1909, motions to dismiss both of the pending motions for a new trial were served and filed, and in January, 1910, were granted. Appeals were taken from the orders dismissing plaintiff's two pending motions for new trial and said orders were by this court reversed on the ground that they were made by a disqualified judge. Bassford v. Earl, 162 Cal. 115, 121 Pac. 395. The motions to dismiss were renewed, and on February 14, 1913, were denied by Judge Gesford. New motions to dismiss were filed, and on May 24, 1913, these motions as well as the motions of plaintiff for a new trial came on for hearing before Judge Latimer then sitting in Solano county. He subsequently filed a written opinion, and then, on September 16, 1913, made formal orders denying both motions to dismiss and granting the motion for a new trial made under authority of the statute of 1907. The defendants have sought to appeal from all of the orders of Judge Gesford and Judge Latimer, but it is conceded that only the order granting the plaintiff's motion for a new trial is appealable, and to the appeal from said order we will therefore devote our attention.

[1] The authority for the order granting the new trial is the act of 1907, to which reference has been made above. The essential parts of that statute for this discussion (Stats. 1907, p. 998) are as follows:

"When any proposed bill of exceptions * * * on motion for a new trial * * * is * * * destroyed by reason of conflagration or other public calamity, and no other record of the proceedings upon the trial thereof can be obtained, and such action or proceeding is subject to review by motion for new trial, pending at the time of such loss or destruction, and it is by the court in which such action or proceeding is pending, deemed impossible or impracticable to restore such proceedings * * * so as to enable the court to review the judgment or order therein by motion for new trial, the court may grant a new trial of such action or proceeding if at the time of such loss or destruction a motion for new trial be pending therein. * * * In order to grant such new trial, it shall be unnecessary to have any bill of exceptions or statement of the case settled, but upon the facts above recited being shown to the satisfaction of the court by affidavit or otherwise, the court shall have power in its discretion to grant such new trial." Section 1.

The title of the act is instructive. It is as follows:

"An act providing for the disposition of actions and proceedings in which bills of exceptions and statements on motion for a new trial have been lost or destroyed by conflagration or other public calamity."

It will be noticed that in the title the past perfect form of the verb is employed and the statute is outlined as referring to cases in which bills of exceptions "have been destroyed." In the body of the act the form of the verb used is the present "is destroyed," but it seems clear that the expression refers to the condition of the record, and not to the act of destruction. This interpretation is strengthened by the title of the statute, by the historical circumstances preceding and attending its passage, and by the rule that remedial statutes are to be liberally construed. Thousands of documents had been destroyed by the great conflagrations in San Francisco and Santa Rosa, and there can be no doubt that this statute was passed for the purpose of relieving one phase of the situation so produced. It would be most unwarranted, therefore, unless the compulsion of the language itself were very great, to hold that the act was intended only for application to conditions arising after its passage. The Legislature was endeavoring to relieve litigants from a situation created by the great fire. In re Mitchell, 120 Cal. 386, 52 Pac. 799, is authority for the rule that when a law is fairly susceptible of two constructions, the one consistent with justice, sound sense, and wise policy should be adopted. See, also, Appeal of Houghton, 42 Cal. 35. It is not necessary to cite any more of the numerous authorities sustaining this well-known and unquestioned rule.

[2, 3] We may then thus read the first part of the statute: "When any bill," etc., "has been destroyed," etc. What conditions must have existed at the time of the destruction of the bill of exceptions? Merely it must appear that the action was subject to review by motion for new trial pending at that time. Of course, the court was not expected to hear the motion at the moment of the fire because the statute itself was not passed until eleven months later. The court could not "deem" anything with reference to the record until the matter was presented. Obviously, therefore, the words "and it is by the court * * * deemed impossible or impracticable to restore such proceedings," have reference not to the date of the destruction, but to the date when the court heard the application authorized by this statute. Any other interpretation is not only opposed to the language of the statute itself, but to the benevolent purpose of it. We think, however, that the statute did contemplate diligence on the part of the moving party in availing himself of such means as existed after the destruction of the record to obtain another transcript of the proceedings upon the trial, and that if by his neglect a means of doing so has been lost by death or for other reason when, by due diligence, he might have caused the restoration of the record, he should not be permitted to contend, at the hearing for the new trial provided in proper cases by the statute, that no other record can be obtained. In such a case his inability to obtain a bill of exceptions would be the result of his neglect and not of the conflagration and the destruction of the original. But the burden of the moving party has been met, at least to the extent that we cannot say the court below erred in holding that Mr. Cannon was not lacking in diligence because of his failure to obtain a new transcript after the burning of the original one.

[4] The reporter, who was present at the trial and subsequently prepared a transcript of the proceedings, died about five months after the conflagration of April 18, 1906. It is perfectly clear that when the application under this statute was made it was impossible to get either a carbon copy of the original transcript or a new transcript by the reporter who had been present at the trial. There was some evidence that a certain phonographic reporter would undertake, if given plenty of time and a fee about five times greater than that originally paid for the transcript, to reproduce it from the notes of the deceased reporter; but opposed to this were affidavits of some of the best reporters in California in which they declared that such a feat was impossible, and there was further testimony that upon at least one occasion, the reporter who said he could transcribe the notes had failed in an effort to read them in court. We cannot say, therefore, that Judge Latimer, in granting the motion for a new trial, abused the discretion with which he was expressly and unqualifiedly clothed by the language of the statute.

But even assuming for the purposes of argument that the statute contemplated the conditions existing at the time of the destruction of the proposed bill of exceptions and not those in existence at the time of the hearing, we cannot say that the lower court erred in granting the motion for a new trial, because the court is clothed by the statute with "power in its discretion to grant such new trial." It is a matter of history and of common knowledge that the practice of the law in San Francisco was thrown into a very disorganized condition by the great conflagration of April 18, 1906. For weeks and months lawyers were deprived of the conveniences to which they had been accustomed, and as soon as an attorney achieved some semblance of organization of his office force, he was kept busy by his clients, who were anxious to collect the money due them from the insurance companies. It would therefore be no abuse of discretion for a court to hold that it was "impracticable" for Mr. Cannon to obtain a new transcript within the five months following the fire. In an elaborate affidavit Mr. Cannon described his engagements prior to April 18, 1906, and deposed that had not the conflagration of that date destroyed the proposed bill of exceptions and the other papers he would have been very shortly thereafter in a position to report finally on the bill of exceptions. He described the chaos resulting from the destruction of his office and his home; the impossibility of transacting any law business in San Francisco for a long time after the fire; the realization on his part that the case must receive early attention; and the making of a memorandum with reference to it; but, as in his affidavit it is set forth, he was "not able to take up the matter until after the death of said shorthand reporter Hyatt." We think the showing of due diligence was sufficient to prevent us from overthrowing the action of Judge Latimer on the ground of abuse of discretion on his part.

[5-7] The constitutionality of the act of 1907 is attacked upon the ground that the subject is not expressed in the title as required by section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution, and that more than one subject is embraced within the title in contravention of the same section of the Constitution. There is no merit in appellant's contentions upon this subject. Bills of exceptions and statements do not differ in essence. Each preserves a record of the proceedings in the lower court for the use of the appellate tribunal. The expressions are frequently considered synonymous. Dennis v. Gordon, 163 Cal. 427, 430, 125 Pac. 1063. Therefore an act which in its title purports to deal with bills of exceptions and statements is not void for duplicity of title and the objection that the title refers to "bills of exceptions" and "statements" while the text deals with "proposed" bills and statements is equally without merit. The title is not misleading merely because it refers to bills of exception in general and not to inchoate bills called "proposed bills of exception." It has been held that where the title embraces a general class while only a special division of that class is contemplated, the constitutional requirement is not disobeyed, as where the title by its terms includes "general" vaccination, while the body of the statute deals with vaccination of children in the public schools. Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal.

[8, 9] Nor is the act an example of special legislation regulating the practice in courts of justice and in contravention of section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution. True, it provides a remedy only for the destruction of proposed statements and bills of exception, and none for settled bills and statements. There is a rational basis for this distinction, however, due to the difference in the nature of the two kinds of documents and to the different degree of knowledge of the court respecting the proposed and the settled bill or statement. A settled bill of exceptions is a court record in the full sense of the term. In case of its destruction its restoration is provided for by the remedial legislation of 1906 (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 73), and the person seeking to have such a destroyed record restored is required to reproduce only its substance. Such "substance" generally is known to the court and to counsel for both litigants. But a proposed bill of exceptions is inchoate. The court has not yet passed upon it, and in the nature of things its contents are not so well known to counsel for both sides of the case as the matters set forth in a settled bill of exceptions after discussion before the judge and his decision upon disputed questions. It would have been unfair to respondents if the Legislature had permitted appellants to restore, from memory, the alleged substance of proposed bills of exceptions with which, in their original form, neither opposing counsel nor the judges could have become familiar. It would have been unfair to appellants with pending proposed bills of exceptions to have left them remediless. Therefore the Legislature made a class of those litigants whose proposed bills of exceptions had been destroyed by great public calamity and empowered courts to administer the remedy least productive of harm to the contending parties, namely, a new trial. There was justification for the classification and the remedy was applicable to all of the class. The act is attacked because it makes no provision for those cases in which a motion for a new trial has been noticed, but no bill of exceptions has been proposed. This failure does not vitiate the statute. An unproposed bill of exceptions whether prepared, partially prepared, or not created at all is to all intents and purposes in the breast of the appellant. The statute was dealing with the destruction of something which had been legally brought to the court's attentions, not to something which might never have a physical existence and might never be destroyed by fire. A law is not special merely because it does not include within its scope all classes which might be benefited by such legislation. Many classes of people suffered from the results of the great fire of 1906. It was for the Legislature to determine which classes required relief, and it is sufficient if the subjects of the legislative solicitude possess such intrinsic peculiarities as to justify the conclusion that special enactment in their behalf is desirable. In re Martin, 157 Cal. 57, 106 Pac. 235, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242. The distinction between proposed bills of exception and those not yet prepared is, we think, sufficient to justify the exclusion of the one class and the inclusion of the other in the provisions of the remedial statute. This argument applies also to the contention that the act is void because it extends aid to the victims of public calamity, but not to those who have suffered from private accident destroying their papers.

[10] The act of 1907 does not impair the obligation of a contract. It merely changes a remedy applicable to a pending proceeding. The judgment in favor of appellants was subject to the court's power to grant a new trial. They possessed no vested right, but they held their judgment, pending the motion for a new trial, subject to the power of the Legislature to authorize the court to grant a new trial under the peculiar circumstances brought about by public calamity. Title, etc., Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 313, 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199. It has been held that an interest acquired under a statute may be lost by reason of the provisions of a later statute, and that the possessor of that interest has no contractual right to have applied the one method of forfeiture existing at the time his interest came into being. Aikins v. Kingsbury, 170 Cal. 674, 678, 151 Pac. 145. The same principle is applicable to a litigant's rights under a judgment which has not become final.

There is nothing in the case of Johnson v. Gebhauer, 159 Ind. 271, 64 N. E. 855, in conflict with these views. In that case the court was considering an attempt on the part of the Legislature to extend the time for filing bills of exceptions in cases in which all the proceedings in the trial court had been already finally disposed of. In other words, the Legislature was seeking to confer upon courts power to act in cases in which said courts had lost jurisdiction.

The statute does apply to the case at bar. It is argued that the law is not retroactive because of the use of the verb "is destroyed." We have previously herein considered the meaning of those words and the general language of the act and its title. Without repetition of that discussion we may say that the purpose of the Legislature to apply it to conditions created before its enactment is very clear, and that purpose is sufficiently expressed in the statute itself. In the second section it is provided that:

"In any case now pending such motion may be made at any time within sixty days after the passage of this act." Statutes of 1907, p. 998.

It is impossible to read the statute without coming to the conclusion that it was intended to operate retroactively.

It is argued that this court should pass upon the subject of respondent's laches because the judge of the superior court failed to exercise the discretion vested in him. It is true that Judge Latimer in his written opinion indicated that he felt himself bound in some measure by the rulings of Judge Gesford in refusing to grant defendants' motions to dismiss the motion for new trial. But the fact remains that he was clothed with a wide discretion, and that he must be presumed to have exercised it. Appellants agree with respondent that the only appealable order herein is that by which Judge Latimer granted the new trial, but maintain that upon this appeal this court may review the other four orders denying motions to dismiss motions for new trial. Respondent insists that the orders of Judges Gesford and Latimer denying the motions to dismiss the motions for new trial may not be reviewed on appeal, and particularly because they were not made the subject of exceptions; but assuming that the view of appellants is the correct one we cannot say that they established laches on the part of respondent. The whole record was before Judge Latimer, and it included all of the affidavits with reference to delays. We cannot say that he erred in holding, under all of the circumstances revealed, that he might exercise his discretion in favor of considering and granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial. Similarly we cannot say that a review of Judge Gesford's rulings would compel a different conclusion from the one which was reached.

The order granting plaintiff's two motions for a new trial is affirmed. The remaining appeals are dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

John W. McInerney was convicted of assault with intent to commit robbery, and appeals from the judgment and order denying new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

Benj. L. McKinley, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The appellant was convicted upon the charge of assault with intent to commit robbery, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The charging part of the information was as follows:

"Assault with intent to commit robbery, committed as follows: The said John W. McInerney on the 10th day of May, A. D. 1915, at the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and with force and violence, and with a deadly weapon, to wit: a loaded revolver, make an assault in and upon the person of one Frank G. Beutler with the felonious intent then, there and thereby, by force, violence, and intimidation, to seize, steal, take and carry away the money, goods, and chattels of the said Frank G. Beutler from the person and immediate presence, and against the will of the said Frank G. Beutler."

Upon the trial the evidence, while otherwise sufficient to justify a conviction, was insufficient to show that the defendant made the assault in question "with a deadly weapon, to wit, a loaded revolver"; and the appellant here contends that his conviction cannot therefore be sustained, for the reason that the prosecution having alleged in its information that the assault in question was made "with a deadly weapon, to wit, a loaded revolver" it was limited to the proof of that particular form and means of assault. We cannot agree with this contention. The information was entirely sufficient to satisfy the requirement of the statute as to the charge of assault with intent to commit robbery without the inclusion in it of any language descriptive of the means by which the party assaulted was put in fear, or of the form of force and violence used to produce that condition. The words in the information "with a deadly weapon, to wit, a loaded revolver," were therefore surplusage which might have been omitted entirely from it without affecting its sufficiency in any way. This being so, we understand the rule of law to be that when such matter may be omitted entirely without affecting the charge against the defendant, it may be considered as surplusage and disregarded, especially where the particular allegation was, as in this case, pleaded under a videlicet. 22 Cyc. 448, and cases cited.

[2] As to the appellant's contention that the court refused to give certain instructions asked by the defendant, it may be said that as to those instructions requested by him touching the foregoing alleged defect in proof as to his use of a particular weapon at the time of the assault, such instructions were properly refused; and as to the other instructions which the defendant requested, and which were not given, we find that with one exception they are substantially covered by other instructions which the court gave. The exception has reference to an instruction asked by the defendant as to the right of the jury to base a reasonable doubt upon the defendant's proof of good reputation. The record shows that the instruction is marked as "given" by the trial judge; but it is not included in the clerk's transcript, purporting to set forth the full charge.

There is no affirmative showing, however, as to whether or not the instruction was in fact given, and, this being so, we must resolve the uncertainty of the record in favor of supporting the judgment.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Roy Akers against Carl Rappe. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, for appellant. Geo. P. Burke, of Watsonville, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $3,000 as stipulated damages upon a contract between the defendant and the predecessors in business of the plaintiff made in partial restraint of trade.

The facts of the case are substantially these: Carl Rappe, the defendant in this action, for many years conducted in the city of Watsonville a jewelry store known as Rappe's Jewelry Store. After building up the business he sold his store and the good will of the establishment in the year 1905 to a certain firm, and in connection with the sale entered into a written contract agreeing that he would not engage in the same business in the city of Watsonville for the period of 20 years either for himself or as the employé of another, and that if he did so he would respond in liquidated damages to the extent of $3,000. The purchasers took possession of the store, and after conducting its business for a time the firm dissolved, and one of its members became the owner of the establishment. Later on he sold to the plaintiff herein, transferring by the sale the good will of the business, and some time later in jorsing and transferring the particular contract in restraint of Rappe's right to conduct a like business in that town. The plaintiff thereafter continued to conduct the jewelry business at its established place. In the month of April, 1912, another jewelry store was opened in Watsonville under the name and sign of "Herbert Rappe, jeweler." Herbert Rappe was the son of the defendant Carl Rappe, and it is the said defendant's connection with the opening and conduct of said store which constitutes the gravamen of the plaintiff's claim in this action.

[1] The evidence educed at the trial shows the following facts with reference to the defendant's connection, activities, and interest in the establishment and conduct of said store, which facts are in the main extracted from the statements of the defendant and his son Herbert Rappe while upon the witness stand, and which are in the record substantially without contradiction: These facts are that the defendant owned the building in which the said jewelry store was opened and conducted under the name of his son; the defendant personally superintended the fitting up of the store; the defendant furnished all the money for the purchase of the stock of goods and personally selected and purchased the stock; the defendant advanced such additional moneys as were needed from time to time in the conduct of the business. The defendant's son kept no bank account, and the defendant gave his son checks on his own bank account from time to time to pay the bills of the store. The defendant consulted with his son and advised him as to the purchase of goods. At the time of the opening of the store the son of the defendant was not a jeweler and had no experience or expertness in the conduct of such an establishment. At the time the store was opened an announcement card was prepared, printed, and generally circulated in the community announcing the opening of "Rappe's Jewelry Store," and signed "Rappe the Jeweler." The defendant knew of the preparation and contents and circulation of said circular, and consulted and advised with his son as to the list of people to whom it should be sent. When the business was opened, the defendant was the only watchmaker or jeweler connected with it or employed in the store. For a considerable period after the store was opened the defendant openly worked in the store at a bench in the front of the store and facing the show window, where he would be conspicuous to passers-by and customers. During a considerable period following the opening of the store the defendant did all of the finer and more expensive repair work done in the establishment while sitting at this bench in view of passers-by, and collected and receipted for the money paid for such work, and in fact during the first year the store was opened made fully two-thirds of the sales and collections, and spent the larger portion of his time during business hours behind the counter or at work at his bench in the store.

From these practically undisputed facts this court is compelled to the conclusion that the evidence establishes without substantial contradiction that the defendant, by his foregoing acts and conduct in connection with the establishment of another jewelry store under the name of his son, violated the spirit and letter of his contract made with the predecessors of the plaintiff and to which the latter succeeded both by the purchase of the good will of the former business, and by the assignment to him of said contract, and that the defendant has thus rendered himself liable to pay the stipulated damages provided in said contract.

The respondent urges in support of the judgment of the trial court that there is a sufficiently substantial conflict in the evidence to sustain such judgment; but upon an examination of the entire record we are satisfied that, whatever conflict there may be in minor portions of the evidence educed at the trial, the essential facts above set forth are practically undisputed, and that, this being so, there is no such substantial conflict as would justify this court in sustaining the judgment.

[2] The respondent further contends that the contract in partial restraint of trade upon which this action was predicated is void for the reason that it provides for an unreasonable length of time during which the defendant must refrain from engaging in business. We cannot agree with this contention. Section 1674 of the Civil Code provides that:

"One who sells the good will of a business may agree with the buyer to refrain from carrying on a similar business within a specified county, city, or a part thereof, so long as the buyer, or any person deriving title to the good will from him, carries on a like business therein."

The evidence shows that the plaintiff is still engaged in conducting the original business under a title thereto and to the good will thereof derived from the persons to whom the defendant sold the same, and with whom such contract was made, and that about six years intervened between the time of such original sale and the time of the opening of the second store. We think that these facts bring the case clearly within the provisions of the above section of the Code, and also within the line of cases holding similar contracts to be valid. Brown v. Kling, 101 Cal. 295, 299, 35 Pac. 995; City Carpet, etc., Works v. Jones, 102 Cal. 506, 36 Pac. 841; Ragsdale v. Nagle, 106 Cal. 332, 39 Pac. 628; Shafer v. Sloan, 3 Cal. App. 337, 85 Pac. 162.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed.

Code, § 468, requiring every railroad company, within two years after filing its original articles, to begin construction of its road, and every year thereafter to complete five miles of its road, till fully completed, under penalty of forfeiture of its right to extend its road beyond the point then completed, applies to its line required by section 291 to be stated in its original articles, and not to extensions for increased terminal facilities on lands subsequently acquired; the proper time for constructing which depends on the increase of commerce and consequent needs.

3. RAILROADS ⇨82(1)—FORFEITURES—ABANDONMENT—RIGHT UNDER LEASE.

Right of a railroad to use tide and submerged lands under a lease from a city, confirmed by the Legislature, and assigned to it, is not affected by any forfeiture, under Civ. Code, § 477, for abandonment of right to use them under the surveyor general's permit, which section 478 provides shall be issued to it for public lands selected by it for its uses.

The general and unlocated grant by Civ. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by the People, on the information of U. S. Webb, Attorney General, against the Southern Pacific Company and another. From an adverse judgment and order, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. W. McKinley and Frank Karr, both of Los Angeles (W. R. Millar, of Los Angeles, and E. J. Foulds, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. A. P. Fleming, L. R. Hewitt, and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and A. L. Stephens, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for new trial.

[1] By sections 474 and 475 of the Civil Code the state has made a grant running to every railroad corporation of a right of way for the location, construction, and maintenance of its railroad, and every necessary adjunct thereof, over any "swamp, overflowed, or other public lands of the state not otherwise disposed of, or in use," not exceeding 200 feet in width, and "not within three miles of any incorporated town or city." In view of the language of subdivision 5 of section 465, empowering every railroad corporation to construct its road over any roadstead or bay, the grant in section 474 must be construed to include tide and submerged lands by the term "public lands." By section 478 provision is made for the selection by any railroad of the location of such right of way, for the approval thereof by the surveyor general, and for the issuance by him to the railroad company of a permit to use the land selected for the uses claimed or desired. Section 477 provides that if, after selecting such right of way and receiving a permit therefor, a railroad corporation shall abandon the use of the lands selected, the same shall revert to the state free from all such uses.

On June 4, 1881, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company selected lands to use for a right of way and for the construction of yards, side tracks, depot buildings, and other adjuncts to its railroad across certain tide-lands in the bay of San Pedro, and the surveyor general issued to it a permit to use said lands for that purpose. Afterwards, in 1887, it selected two strips for the extension of said right of way: One, curving toward the east, designated as a spur, extending 2,260 feet along the harbor front line of the inner harbor of the bay; the other, running southerly to the crossing of San Pedro street and thence curving westerly near the shore line of the inner harbor, and extending to the United States government reservation, said extension being nearly 20,000 feet long. On April 7, 1887, the surveyor general approved this selection and issued a permit empowering the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to take and use said strips for extensions of its line thereon, and for yards, side tracks, spur tracks, depot buildings, warehouses, wharves, and other adjuncts to facilitate the transportation of freight and passengers to and from the bay. At that time the city of San Pedro had not become incorporated and the town of Wilmington had been disincorporated by the act of March 12, 1887 (Stats. 1887, p. 108). Consequently, the land selected was not within three miles of any incorporated town or city. Prior to the year 1888, the said company extended its track from its previous terminus on the bay, constructing the westerly branch of the extension to a point where the east line of San Pedro street in the city of San Pedro, now Los Angeles, crosses said strip, and the easterly spur extension to a point 1,000 feet from the extremity thereof. It has ever since the construction thereof continued to operate its railroad over these tracks. It has never extended its tracks further along said strips, or either of them. The two defendants operate together, one under a lease from the other.

The action was begun by the state to enjoin the defendants from laying or maintaining any railroad or other improvements upon the portions of the two strips upon which, as above stated, it has not constructed any railroad, and for judgment that all rights in said portions of said strips of land have become lost by abandonment, and forfeited to the state of California. The defendants claim under the permits from the surveyor general above mentioned as evidence of the specific location of the general grant made by the state by said sections of the Civil Code.

"Every railroad corporation must, within two years after filing its original articles of incorporation, begin the construction of its road, and must every year thereafter complete and put in full operation at least five miles of its road, until the same is fully completed; and upon its failure so to do, for the period of one year, its right to extend its road beyond the point then completed is forfeited."

Respondent claims that the unused ends of these extensions are forfeited by reason of this provision. We do not think section 468 applies to this case. It refers to the original articles of incorporation which are provided for in section 291. Section 291 requires the original articles of incorporation of any railroad company to state the kind of road to be constructed and "the place from and to which it is intended to be run, and all the intermediate branches." The purpose of section 468 is to secure the performance of the promise implied from this part of the articles; that is, the due completion and full operation of the road from one end to the other and also of the intermediate branches. It has no logical relation to the construction of tracks over lands subsequently acquired at one terminus for the purposes of increasing its facilities and capacity to accommodate the traffic to be handled at that end of the line. The railroad from Los Angeles to San Pedro was completed, and a connection with the San Pedro inner harbor and with boats sailing therefrom near the northerly end of the spur extension had been made, and the system was in full operation many years before the issuance of the permit to use the land for these extensions. It is clear from the facts shown that the extensions of track for which this permit was obtained was not for a branch road, or for a new road, in any usual meaning of those terms, but were merely for the purpose of affording space for enlarging the terminal facilities at the harbor, from time to time, as demanded by the volume of commerce. The proper time for constructing additional trackage or adjuncts at the terminus of a railroad must depend on the increase of commerce and the needs arising therefrom. The completion of a proposed extension of its road at one end of its line, for reasons of this character, does not come within the object intended to be secured by the forfeiture clause of section 468. Arcata v. Arcata, etc., Co., 92 Cal. 646, 28 Pac. 676. It is not a part of the completion of the road between the termini as described in the original articles of incorporation, to which that section relates.

[3] It also appears that in 1906 Randolph H. Miner obtained a lease for 50 years from the city of San Pedro of a tract of land embracing the second or westerly parcel here in controversy, in consideration whereof he agreed to construct a sea wall, docks, and slips along the harbor line as finally fixed by the United States government, with channels leading therefrom to deep water, and to fill in with earth the space between said wall and the shore. This lease was confirmed on March 23, 1907, by the Legislature. Stats. 1907, p. 987; Koyer v. Miner, 156 Pac. 1023. In pursuance of this lease, the harbor wall with the improvements contemplated were constructed and the space behind filled in with earth, so that the defendant's westerly strip now lies inland, except at the extreme end, where it intersects the harbor line. Thereafter Miner conveyed to the defendants all his interest in said westerly parcel. This conveyance is pleaded as a defense. The right given to the defendants by the Civil Code and the surveyor general's permit is a right continuing during the corporate existence of the defendant Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and perhaps for any lawful extensions of its period of existence. This may carry it beyond the expiration of the 50-year lease given to Miner. Consequently, the grant from Miner is not a complete answer to the cause of action with regard to this parcel. If the right under the surveyor general's permit is now forfeited, such forfeiture would defeat the right of possession of the defendants to the property under the permit, but it would not defeat its right to continue in possession under the Miner lease. If the judgment had merely declared that the right obtained by the surveyor general's permit hereinbefore mentioned had been forfeited and had reverted to the state, no error could have been predicated upon the conveyance by Miner to the defendants. In that event, it would not have affected the right of the defendants to occupy and use the land for railroad purposes under their grant from Miner for the period of the lease. But the judgment goes further and declares that the title of the defendants to that parcel has re-invested in the state of California "free of any claim or title of the defendants." In so far as this declares that it is free of any claim held by the defendants by virtue of the grant from Miner it is erroneous, even if it should be conceded that there has been a forfeiture of the rights under the aforesaid permit from the state.

This brings us to the question whether the use of the lands selected had been abandoned within the meaning of section 477 of the Civil Code, so that the land had reverted to the state, at the time the action was begun, as provided in that section.

The facts bearing upon this question are as follows: In December, 1891, the defendants began the work of extending the railroad over the spur along the harbor front line, by driving piling along the sea wall upon which to erect a wharf and railroad track. They had driven the piles for 660 feet southerly from the northerly end of the unoccupied 1,000 feet when they were enjoined from continuing the work by the city of San Pedro in an action against them, and this injunction continued in force until March, 1894. San Pedro v. Southern P. R. Co., 101 Cal. 333, 35 Pac. 993. Thereafter nothing further was done toward the completion or use of the spur extension, until January, 1903. At that time they put in a bulkhead along the sea wall line and filled in the land behind it. The harbor lines had been changed so as to cut off and include in the channel the extremity of this proposed spur. The bulkhead was completed in August, 1903. Thereafter they used this 1,000 feet of the spur extension until January, 1903. At that time they put in bridge materials and other things needed for the maintenance of their railroad, but no railroad track, wharves, or other structures connected with said railroad have been built thereon. The construction of a wharf on the northerly end thereof was begun in 1904, but it was discontinued because the material provided for that purpose was needed for immediate use to construct a levee on the Colorado river to restrain a flood in that river. Afterwards, during the years 1905, 1906, 1907, and 1908, the defendants had plans drawn, estimates made, and other preparatory work done for the building of railroad tracks and wharves on this 1,000 feet and actually did a part of the work, but it was stopped because of the uncertainty of the defendants as to their title to the property. These doubts, we presume, arose out of the public agitation and discussion preceding the initiation, in October, 1908, of the litigation over tidelands bordering on San Pedro Bay. See People v. Southern P. R. Co., 166 Cal. 614, 138 Pac. 94. This action was begun some time in 1909, and the rights here involved were expressly excluded from the judgments in those cases. A part of the strip was included in some of the tideland locations in controversy there. There was no evidence of any declaration by the defendants, or any of their officers or agents, indicating that the defendants, or either of them, had abandoned, or ever intended to abandon, the rights they possessed under the grant of the right of way upon this portion of the selection. There is no proof that the needs of commerce during this period were such that the public interest demanded that the railroad should be completed farther along these strips, or that wharves should be built thereon, or that, during this period, the existing, or probable immediate future traffic, would have justified the cost of building such tracks or wharves, or that any other person or corporation desired, or was willing, to put these lands to any immediate public use. It was stipulated that the construction of the spur is now a proper preparation for the increasing commerce at the port. During the entire period the defendants were actively operating the railroad from San Pedro to Los Angeles, which was an important part of the Southern Pacific system, and there was a very heavy traffic thereon. It is not claimed that they were not at all times abundantly able to lay tracks on these extensions if they had desired so to do. No reason for their failure therein appears, except that until about the time the action was begun there was no immediate necessity therefor growing out of the needs of commerce. With respect to the westerly strip extending over the lands covered by the Miner lease, near the original shore line, it does not appear that any use has been made of that portion thereof lying southerly of the crossing of San Pedro street, and no acts of control have been exercised by the defendants except the aforesaid transaction following the lease to Miner and the payment of taxes thereon. There is no evidence, however, of any intention by the defendants to abandon this strip except such inferences as may be drawn from the failure to extend the tracks over the same. No person ever disputed the right of the defendants therein, or ever occupied the same adversely. It was stipulated that both of these strips of land have been assessed for taxes by the state to the defendants and that the defendants have paid the taxes thereon.

[4] The grant from the state made by section 474 of the Civil Code is a direct grant to each company accepting it. It is general and unlocated, but when a railroad corporation selects the land it desires, files its plat thereof, and its selection is recorded and approved by the surveyor general, and his permit to use the same is duly issued to the corporation, the grant becomes defined and complete and is as effective to convey the right as it would have been if made by legislative act or by a duly authorized patent describing the land with precision. This permit, therefore, in connection with the statutory grant, constituted the defendants grantees of an easement or franchise over the land described for use of their railroad and for all necessary adjuncts thereof. The rules for determining whether or not the right granted has been forfeited by breach of condition subsequent are, consequently, the same as those whose which apply to any direct grant of a franchise or lease to use land for a public purpose.

[5, 6] From the facts above stated it is clear that the finding of the court below that the defendants had abandoned the strips of land in controversy has no support in the evidence, except that which it may derive from the fact that there was a nonuse of the 1,000-foot strip for the nine years from 1894 to 1903 and a nonuse of the other branch from 1888 until the beginning of the action. It is the theory of the plaintiff that nonuse of such a franchise for these periods is sufficient evidence of both the fact of abandonment and the intention to abandon. The court below evidently made its finding upon this theory. In this we think it was in error.

The rule upon this subject is thus stated:

"As a general rule, in order to constitute an abandonment of an easement in a right of way by a railroad company there must be a nonuser accompanied by unequivocal and decisive acts on the part of the company, clearly showing an intention to abandon. * * * In the absence of a statute, mere nonuser for any length of time will not work an abandonment." 33 Cyc. 222.

See, also, 1 Corpus Juris, 8.

Our only statute bearing upon the subject is the fourth clause of section 811 of the Civil Code, declaring that a servitude which has been "acquired by enjoyment" is extinguished by "disuse thereof by the owner of the servitude for the period prescribed for acquiring title by enjoyment." As this franchise was acquired by grant and not by enjoyment, this provision does not apply to it. The rule above stated is fully supported by the decisions in this state and elsewhere. Smith v. Worn, 93 Cal. 212, 28 Pac. 944; Home R. E. Co. v. Los Angeles P. Co., 163

Cal. 714, 126 Pac. 972; Moon v. Rollins, 36 Cal. 338, 95 Am. Dec. 181; Judson v. Malloy, 40 Cal. 309; Richardson v. McNulty, 24 Cal. 345; Lawrence v. Fulton, 19 Cal. 690; Utt v. Frey, 106 Cal. 397, 39 Pac. 807; Wood v. Etiwanda W. Co., 147 Cal. 234, 81 Pac. 512. In Smith v. Worn the court says:

"An easement acquired by deed is not lost by mere nonuser. It must be accompanied with the express or implied intention of abandonment."

In Moon v. Rollins, in defining "abandonment," the court said:

"It is a question of intention, and has been so held over and over again, and not a question of time, except so far as the jury are entitled to consider lapse of time in connection with other circumstances of claim, or nonclaim, and acts of ownership and dominion, or a want of such acts, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention."

In Lawrence v. Fulton an instruction, which declared "that lapse of time does not constitute an abandonment," was approved, and it was added that, in deciding the question of abandonment, lapse of time was not, to speak with exactness, the material element, but only "a material element to be considered." There are some cases in which it is said that abandonment by nonuser may be the more readily presumed in the case of the grant of an easement for public use. Louisville Trust Co. v. Cincinnati, 76 Fed. 315, 22 C. C. A. 334; Henderson v. Railway Co. (C. C.) 21 Fed. 368. But in each of these cases there were other circumstances indicating a positive intent to abandon and nonuser was not said to be in itself sufficient to show such intent.

In this case there are no other circumstances to show the intent to abandon the property, and there are indications that such was not the intent. Indeed, it is not seriously claimed that there ever was, in fact, such intent. The payment of taxes could not have been regularly made on these strips unless the defendants had included them in their annual statement describing them as parts of their right of way, as provided in section 3664 of the Political Code. This, it is admitted, was done. This alone is positive evidence of intention to retain these unused rights of way, and not to abandon them. The deal with Miner shows that defendants were diligently guarding the parcels against encroachments by others. The entire course of conduct concerning the spur along the harbor line tends to disprove the purpose to abandon it. We therefore conclude that the finding is contrary to the evidence.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; S. El. Crow, Judge.

Action by George C. Tucker against Samuel Cooper. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward J. Dennison, of Los Angeles, for appellant. B. P. Welch and J. R. Jaffray, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to be due to the negligence of defendant. The case was tried before the court sitting without a jury, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleges, in substance, that plaintiff was engaged at the special request of defendant in assisting him in baling hay with a hay press supplied by defendant; that in the course of such employment he drove the team of horses which furnished power to operate the hay press; that a short time prior to the accident, and without the knowledge of the plaintiff, the defendant replaced an oak doubletree with a piece of pine wood, which was attached to and thereby became a part of the press; that about 10 or 15 minutes after the substitution had been made, and while the team was pulling, and the sweep was in a condition of "great strain," the piece of pine wood broke and released the sweep, which rebounded and sprang back with great force, and struck plaintiff, fracturing his right leg in three places, and causing the injuries complained of; and that plaintiff was driving the team in full reliance upon defendant having furnished "an ordinarily safe doubletree." It is also alleged that the piece of pine wood was not of sufficient strength or size or of such material to withstand the strain which is ordinarily placed upon a doubletree in the prosecution of such work; "that a doubletree of oak is proper"; and that the defendant either knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that the piece of pine wood was not strong enough or fitted for such purpose. It is further alleged that the plaintiff incurred as necessary medical and hospital expenses upwards of $600; that he lost in wages at least $500, and, in addition, "suffered great pain and deprivation by reason of said injuries." In the prayer of the complaint plaintiff asks for judgment for damages in the sum of $10,000, and costs. The defendant demurred to the complaint on general grounds, and upon the special ground that the complaint shows that the plaintiff was "acting as a mere volunteer in doing certain employment upon the farm." The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant filed an answer denying that the plaintiff was engaged at his special request, and that he was without knowledge of the substitution of the pine wood for the oak doubletree. The court's findings were in accord with the foregoing facts as they appeared in the complaint, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,997, and costs.

[1] 1. The first point relied upon by the defendant is the alleged error of the court in rendering judgment for a sum in excess of $997, the amount which was found to represent the actual loss of wages and medical and hospital expenses. The defendant contends that, notwithstanding the complaint sets out in detail the compound fracture of the bones of the leg, and the suffering and pain caused thereby, and prays for judgment in the sum of $10,000, there is no issue tendered in the pleadings of any sum of money in excess of the $1,100, the amount specially pleaded by the plaintiff as the actual expenses and loss of wages. A similar question was discussed in Riser v. Walton, 78 Cal. 490, 21 Pac. 362, where the court said:

"The complaint states facts sufficient to sustain a judgment for damages, and, while it does not contain a formal allegation of the amount of damages sustained by plaintiff, it concludes with a prayer for judgment for $1,400, and costs. We think that the equivalent of a statement of the amount of damage which he had sustained."

In 5 Encl. of PL & Pr. p. 710, note 2, it is said:

"The controlling claim for damage is contained in the prayer for judgment, and will obviate the necessity of stating the amount elsewhere in the complaint."

See, also, Barr v. Southern Cal. Edison Co., 24 Cal. App. 22, 140 Pac. 47; Bank of British Columbia, etc., v. City of Port Townsend, 16 Wash. 450, 47 Pac. 896; 13 Cyc. 175. The fact that several of the items entering into the damage are formally alleged in the complaint does not preclude the plaintiff from praying for judgment for the total damages suffered, of which such items are a part. Moreover, the defendant did not take advantage of the point by demurrer. Riser v. Walton, supra; Badigalupi et al. v. Phoenix Bldg. etc. Co. et al., 14 Cal. App. 632, 112 Pac. 892. Nor do we think that there is any merit in defendant's contention that the finding on this issue is not supported by the evidence.

[2-4] 2. At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the relationship of master and servant had not been established. The court denied the motion upon the basis of a stipulation which had been filed in the action by the parties herein. The terms of the stipulation material to this point read as follows:

"On or about August 4, 1912, each having hay to be baled, plaintiff and defendant agreed that plaintiff would assist defendant in baling defendant's hay on the farm of Mrs. Mary Cooper, with a hay press supplied by defendant, and in return for such services defendant would assist plaintiff and use said hay press to bale hay for plaintiff on a nearby farm. It appears that said parties are cousins."

There was no other evidence introduced regarding this issue. The defendant contends that the facts set forth in the stipulation are not sufficient to show the alleged relationship, as it does not appear that the plaintiff represented the will of the defendant as to the mode and manner in which he would assist the defendant in accomplishing the work, and that, at most, the facts show that plaintiff was merely representing the defendant's will as to the general result sought to be obtained. The authorities relied upon by the defendant, however, are all cases involving the principle applying between persons and independent contractors, or the servants of independent contractors, and are not in point here. Section 2009 of the Civil Code provides:

"A servant is one who is employed to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling, and who in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter, who is called his master."

But, where the defendant has the right of control, it is not necessary that he actually exercise such control. Linnehan v. Rollins, 137 Mass. 123, 50 Am. Rep. 287; Giacomini v. Pacific Lumber Co., 5 Cal. App. 218, 89 Pac. 1059. Nor is it material to such relationship that the servant does not receive pecuniary compensation. See Labatt's Master and Servant (2d Ed.) vol. 1, p. 60; Bartow v. Old Colony R. R. Co., 143 Mass. 535, 10 N. E. 255; Union Ry., etc., Co. v. Kallaher, 114 Ill. 325, 2 N. E. 77. An implication arises from the terms of the stipulation that the plaintiff was subject to the control and direction of the defendant in the prosecution of the work, while the plaintiff's services were rendered at the request of the defendant and for his benefit. This is sufficient to establish the defendant's liability, under section 1969 of the Civil Code, to indemnify the plaintiff in so far as the relationship of master and servant is concerned.

[5, 6] 3. The defendant further contends that the complaint is deficient in other particulars. It is claimed that "there was no allegation of negligence that directly and proximately resulted in injury" to the plaintiff. The same objection is made to the findings of facts by the court, which substantially follow the allegations of the complaint. The defendant points out that, although the complaint declares the injury resulted from the substitution of the pine wood for the oak doubletree, the evidence shows the injury was directly and proximately caused by the springing back of the sweep due to the "great strain" which plaintiff had caused in driving the team of horses. But the complaint alleges in sequence a series of facts and circumstances which we think establish the causation between the negligent act of the defendant in attaching the piece of pine wood in the place of the oak doubletree, and the injury to the plaintiff. It is also asserted that the complaint does not specifically allege negligence on the part of the defendant, as there is no general allegation of negligence nor any specific act that is alleged to have been negligently done or omitted. The complaint does, however, allege the facts relating to the substitution of the pine wood for the oak doubletree as a part of the machinery of the press, and these facts, under the circumstances alleged, justify the inference of negligence. Silveira v. Iverson, 125 Cal. 266, 57 Pac. 996; Quinn v. Electric Laundry Co., 155 Cal. 500, 101 Pac. 794, 17 Ann. Cas. 1100; Cooley v. Brunswick Drug Company (App.) 157 Pac. 13. It was unquestionably the duty of defendant to provide reasonably safe appliances for the prosecution of the work plaintiff was performing, and an omission in that regard constituted negligence. Fogarty v. Southern Pacific Co. et al., 151 Cal. 785, 91 Pac. 650; Carlson v. Cucamonga Water Co., 7 Cal. App. 382, 94 Pac. 399.

[7] 4. We are of the opinion that defendant's contention that "there is no allegation in the complaint that the defendant had knowledge, actual or imputed, that the doubletree was not reasonably safe for the proper prosecution of the work," is without merit. The allegation of the complaint on this point is sufficient to present the issue, and the finding thereon is supported by the evidence.

5. There was evidence to support the finding of the court that "plaintiff had no knowledge of such substitution." Nor can it be said, as defendant contends, that had plaintiff used his senses, he must have seen the piece of pine wood which was attached in place of the oak doubletree, and have known of the dangers attending the change. The facts show that plaintiff had not observed defendant while he was replacing the doubletree, as he was engaged in work on the opposite side of the press, and, although he knew a change had been made, he was not aware, until after the accident, that the new doubletree consisted of a piece of pine wood. Bresette v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 162 Cal. 74, 121 Pac. 312, is relied upon by the defendant to the effect that the plaintiff should have known of the substitution of the pine wood for the oak doubletree, but a study of the facts of that case clearly show that it is not applicable here.

These are the only points requiring mention.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by James Edward Dickinson, as administrator, against the Southern Pacific Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Borton & Thelle, of Bakersfield, for appellants. James Donovan, of Los Angeles, Bell & Ingalls, of Bakersfield, and H. A. Ingalls, of Wasco (Jas. W. Bell, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Action to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. The defendants are railway corporations, the one owning, and the other operating under lease, a line of steam railway running through the city of Bakersfield. A train of said line ran into a buggy which the decedent, Samuel Dickinson, was driving, and Dickinson was instantly killed. Judgment went in favor of the plaintiff for $10,230. From this judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal.

There is no room to doubt that the evidence warranted the jury in finding that there had been negligence in the operation of the train. The appellants contend, however, that the decedent was himself guilty of contributory negligence, and that for this reason their motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. Chester avenue, the street upon which Samuel Dickinson was driving, runs north and south in the city of Bakersfield. It is intersected at right angles by Thirty-Third street. The railway track runs in an easterly and westerly direction, and crosses Chester avenue at Thirty-Third street. The trains coming over the track toward Bakersfield approach from the west. At Chester avenue there are three tracks; a main line and two sidings. The main line is the most southerly, and it was upon this track that the train which struck Dickinson was running. Dickinson was coming along Chester avenue from the north. The accident occurred in the daytime.

The appellants rely upon the rule, well established by many decisions of this court, that the track of a steam railway is in itself "a sign of danger, and one intending to cross must avail himself of every opportunity to look and listen for approaching trains." Herbert v. S. P. Co., 121 Cal. 230, 53 Pac. 651; Holmes v. S. P. C. Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 161, 167, 31 Pac. 834; Green v. L. A., etc., Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 37, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68; Hutson v. S. Cal. Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 701, 704, 89 Pac. 1093; Griffin v. S. P., etc., Ry. Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 Pac. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842. Of course, where the circumstances are such that the injured person could not, by the exercise of his faculties of sight and hearing, have discovered the approach of a train in time to avoid injury, his failure to look or to listen will not preclude recovery. Martin v. S. P. Co., 150 Cal. 124, 88 Pac. 701; Eaton v. S. P. Co., 22 Cal. App. 461, 134 Pac. 801. Whether the case be one in which the conditions force the conclusion that the injured person did not exercise reasonable care for his own safety, or be one in which it is open to a jury to find either way on the issue of contributory negligence, is sometimes a close question. In Griffin v. S. P., etc., Ry. Co., supra, it was held by a majority of the court that the case fell within the first category, but there was a division of opinion on the point.

The case at bar presents a situation somewhat similar to that before the court in the Griffin Case. On the northwesterly corner of Chester avenue and Thirty-Third street was an ice plant, and the noise of the machinery operated in this plant made it difficult, if not impossible, to hear approaching trains. On the southerly side of this building was an ice-loading rack, and this, together with two freight cars which were standing on the most northerly of the three tracks and extending well into Chester avenue, obstructed the view of one approaching the crossing until he was almost on the second of the three tracks. We do not find it necessary to decide whether the evidence in this case was such as to compel the conclusion that the deceased, after reaching the point at which he had a view along the main track, would still, by the exercise of reasonable care, have been able to stop his horse and thus avoid a collision. The judgment must be reversed on a different ground, and as the evidence may not be precisely the same on a second trial, we think it better to leave the court below unhampered in passing upon the question whether contributory negligence is, at such trial, established as a matter of law.

One of the grounds upon which reversal is sought is that the damages awarded are excessive. In addition to the recovery sought on account of the death of Samuel Dickinson, the plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he had suffered a loss of $230 through destruction of the horse, the harness, and the buggy. The verdict was for $10,230. Plainly $10,000 of this sum was awarded for the death of plaintiff's intestate. It appeared in the evidence that at the time of the accident Samuel Dickinson was of the age of 78 years and 9 months. He was survived by a wife, two sons, two daughters, and eight grandchildren. One of the grandchildren was living with Samuel Dickinson and his wife. Dickinson's occupation was that of a farmer. The only evidence of his earnings in that calling was that of the plaintiff, his son, who testified that the income of the decedent from his farm was $1,000 a year, and that the rental value of a place like that which he occupied would be about $300 a year. This left a return, from his labor and personal efforts, of $700 per year; but this, as the witness testified, did not take into account any deduction for living expenses. The widow testified that her husband had been in good health and able to do a good day's work; that her life with him was pleasant, his habits good, and his companionship pleasant and agreeable.

[1] There was no evidence offered to show the expectancy of life of a man of Dickin-

son's age. The courts may, however, take judicial notice of the mortality tables in common use. Gordon v. Tweedy, 74 Ala. 232, 49 Am. Rep. 813; Louisville, etc., Co. v. Miller, 141 Ind. 533, 37 N. E. 343; Atchison, etc., Co. v. Ryan, 62 Kan. 682, 64 Pac. 603. An examination of such tables shows that Samuel Dickinson's expectancy of life was about $4\frac{8}{10}$ years.

[2] This being the showing, the award of $10,000 was palpably in excess of any sum which the jury was authorized to find as the damage resulting to the heirs of Samuel Dickinson by reason of his death. The action is based on section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At common law no remedy was given for injuries causing death. The right of the survivors to recover in such cases is purely statutory. It is thoroughly settled by many decisions in this state and elsewhere that a plaintiff, suing under a statute like section 377, "does not represent the right of action which the deceased would have had if the latter had survived the injury, but can recover only for the pecuniary loss suffered by the plaintiff" (or the heirs represented by him) "on account of the death of the relative; that sorrow and mental anguish caused by the death are not elements of damage; and that nothing can be recovered as a solatium for wounded feelings." Morgan v. Southern Pacific, 95 Cal. 516, 30 Pac. 603, 17 L. R. A. 71, 29 Am. St. Rep. 143, and cases cited; Munro v. Dredging Co., 84 Cal. 515; Lange v. Schoettler, 115 Cal. 390, 47 Pac. 139; Burk v. A. & M. R. R. Co., 125 Cal. 364, 57 Pac. 1065, 73 Am. St. Rep. 52; Sneed v. Marysville Gas Co., 149 Cal. 710, 87 Pac. 376; Hale v. S. B., etc., Co., 156 Cal. 716, 106 Pac. 83; Diller v. Northern California Power Co., 162 Cal. 536, 123 Pac. 359, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 908; Ruiz v. S. B. Gas, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 191, 128 Pac. 330.

[3] In such cases the jury may consider the relations which existed between the heirs and the deceased during the lifetime of the latter (Beeson v. G. M. M. Co., 57 Cal. 20), and the loss of comfort, society, support, and protection of the deceased (Munro v. Dredging Co., supra). But, as is repeatedly declared in our decisions, the loss of comfort and society are to be considered only "with reference to the value of the life of the deceased, and the pecuniary loss to the plaintiff caused by the death." Morgan v. S. P. Co., supra. As was said by Temple, J., in Lange v. Schoettler, supra, referring to the element of deprivation of comfort, society, and protection:

"It has always been held that this was in strict accordance with the rule that only the pecuniary value of the life to the relatives could be recovered. The probable comfort, society, and protection of the deceased had some pecuniary value."

So in Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., supra, it is stated that:

"In determining the financial loss to the widow and infant child, resulting from the death of the husband and father, the jury may consider the financial loss accruing from the deprivation of the society, comfort, care, and protection of the deceased, as well as of his support."

It is not possible to measure in exact terms of money the loss which a surviving husband, wife, or child may have sustained through being deprived of the comfort and society of the deceased spouse or parent. For this reason, some play is allowed to the discretion of the jury by the provision of section 377 that such damages may be allowed as under all the circumstances of the case may be just. But, in fixing the amount, the jury is always bound by the fundamental rule that pecuniary damage is the limit of recovery, and the amount allowed must bear some reasonable relation to the pecuniary loss shown by the evidence.

[4] Here, as we have seen, the deceased had a probable expectancy of less than five years of life. His earnings, assuming that they would all have been applied for the benefit of his family, would have amounted to less than $3,500 during the probable remaining span of his years. The verdict for $10,000 can therefore be sustained only upon the theory that his life, apart from any contributions he might make from his earnings, had a pecuniary value of more than $6,500 to his widow and heirs. There is no evidence to justify such a conclusion. Eliminating, as we must, any consideration of the grief and mental suffering occasioned to the survivors by the death, it is impossible to conceive how the loss of the comfort, society, and protection of the deceased could have had a money value of anything like the amount awarded by the jury. Verdicts have frequently been set aside where the disproportion between the loss proven and the amount awarded was not so great as that which appears here. Atlanta & W. P. Rd. Co. v. Newton, 85 Ga. 517, 11 S. E. 776; Taylor v. Long Island R. Co., 16 App. Div. 1, 44 N. Y. Supp. 820; Stillings v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 84 App. Div. 201, 82 N. Y. Supp. 726; English v. S. P. Co., 13 Utah, 407, 45 Pac. 47, 35 L. R. A. 155, 57 Am. St. Rep. 772; Vowell v. Issaquah Coal Co., 31 Wash. 103, 71 Pac. 725.

We do not think it necessary to discuss any of the other questions argued in the briefs.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

CAMP RINCON RESORT CO. et al. v. ESHLEMAN et al., Railroad Commission. (L. A. 4078.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1916.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES $\hookrightarrow$ 261½
New, vol. 17 Key-No. Series—REGULATION BY COMMISSION—"PUBLIC UTILITY."

A telephone line which, with its connection with a through line telephone company, is open to accommodate such of the public as frequent a camp for public entertainment is a "public utility" under Const. art. 12, § 23, defining a public telephone utility.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Public Utility.]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES $\hookrightarrow$ 261½
New, vol. 17 Key-No. Series—REGULATION BY COMMISSION.

An order of the Railroad Commission requiring connection between two such lines, such connection being merely a continuation of a service which the objecting owner of one of them had previously voluntarily assumed, is authorized by Public Utilities Act (St. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 38) § 40, as to physical connections between telephone lines.

In Bank. Certiorari by Camp Rincon Resort Company and another against John M. Eshleman and others constituting the Railroad Commission. Order of the Commission affirmed.

MacKnight & Fitzgerald, Geo. W. MacKnight, Ray H. Fitzgerald, and H. B. Birchley, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Certiorari to review an order of the Railroad Commission.

Camp Rincon Resort Company, one of the petitioners, conducts a camp for the entertainment of the public, at a point in the San Gabriel Canyon, some 13 miles from the mouth of the canyon. Follows, the other petitioner, conducts a similar camp on the other fork of the canyon. The two petitioners are the joint owners of a telephone line extending from their respective camps to the mouth of the canyon, where the line connects with the main line of the Home Telephone Company. The petitioners' line was used for their own accommodation, and was open to the use of persons sojourning at the two camps. Messages could be sent to an exchange of the Home Telephone Company and through this exchange to the various points on the lines of that company. The petitioners collected, from persons staying at their camps and using the telephone line, a charge of 10 cents in addition to the regular long-distance toll of the Home Telephone Company for any connection made through its exchange. Of the 10 cents, one-half was paid to the Home Telephone Company, and the other half was retained by the petitioners, respectively.

Cold Brook Camp Company operates a like public camp in the San Gabriel Canyon, some 7 miles above Camp Rincon. In 1913 it built a telephone line from its line to Camp Rincon, where its line was connected with that of the petitioners. This connection was made pursuant to an agreement, under which $100 was to be paid to the petitioners for the use of their line during the year ending June 30, 1914. During that year Cold Brook Camp Company, and the members of the public residing at its camp, used the telephone line of the petitioners in connection with that of the Cold Brook Company. The agreed sum was paid. The connection continued for some months after June 30, 1914, no agreement having been arrived at for the compensation to be paid during the second year. In September, 1914, the petitioners disconnected the line of the Cold Brook Camp Company, whereupon that company filed a complaint with the Railroad Commission, asking that the petitioners be directed to reconnect the line upon the payment of a compensation to be fixed by the commission. The commission made an order directing such connection to be made on the payment by the Cold Brook Company of $50 per year. It is this order which is now under review.

[1] The petitioners argue that the commission was without jurisdiction, because, as is claimed, the line maintained by them was not a public utility, but a mere private convenience for the use of the owners of the two camps. But the evidence before the commission clearly justified a different conclusion. Under the Constitution of this state (article 12, § 23) every corporation or person owning, operating, managing, or controlling any plant for the transmission of telephone messages to or for the public is declared to be a public utility. It may well be conceded that a purely private business or enterprise cannot be converted into a public utility by mere legislative declaration. But certainly a telephone line operated for the use and accommodation of the public is a public utility, without regard to statutory or constitutional declaration. The camps of the petitioners were open to the accommodation of the public. The telephone lines were devoted to the use of the persons occupying these camps. Here, then, was a devotion of the lines to that portion of the public which enjoyed the conveniences offered by the camps. A service of this kind, offered to "the public generally, or to any defined portion of it," is a public service. Pinney & Boyle v. Los Angeles G. & E. Corp., 168 Cal. 12, 141 Pac. 620, L. R. A. 1915C, 282, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 471. The petitioners did not offer the use of their telephone to privileged and selected individuals in their camps. The service was offered to all, within the class of camp occupants, who desired to use it.

[2] If the petitioners were conducting a public utility, the Cold Brook Company was also conducting a public utility. The order requiring the connection of the two lines was made under the authority of section 40 of the Public Utilities Act. The section was considered by this court in Pacific Telephone Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652. It was there held that an order requiring a company to connect its lines with those of a competing company, where there had been no such connection theretofore and the first company had not held itself out as willing to make such connections, could not be sustained. The questions involved were so fully discussed in that case that there is no occasion here to repeat our views. It will suffice to say that the present proceeding is not within the rule of the Pacific Telephone Company Case, for the reason that the connection here directed to be made was merely a continuation of a service which the petitioner had voluntarily assumed. Whether we regard the Cold Brook Camp Company itself, or the occupants of its camp, as constituting the public to whose use the lines of the petitioner had been offered and dedicated, the fact remains that the connection which the commission ordered was within the scope of a public service which the petitioners had assumed to supply. There was, therefore, no violation of constitutional right in requiring the continuation of the service.

The order is affirmed.

MARIN MUNICIPAL WATER DIST. et al.
v. DOLGE, Auditor of Marin Municipal Water District. (S. F. 7732.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1916.
Rehearing Denied July 6, 1916.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §46(1)—VALIDITY OF STATUTES—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED—MATTERS NOT NECESSARY TO DECISION.

The validity of St. 1911, p. 1290, as amended by St. Sp. Sess. 1911, p. 92, authorizing the formation of water districts, will not be considered on appeal of mandamus proceedings to compel the auditor of a water district holding office "at the pleasure of the board" to countersign bonds to be issued by the district, where the act does not require the bonds to be countersigned by any officer, since the court will not decide a constitutional question, unless such construction is absolutely necessary.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES §183½ — WATER DISTRICT—OFFICERS—AUDITOR.

Under St. 1911, p. 1290, as amended by St. Sp. Sess. 1911, p. 92, authorizing the formation of water districts, section 10 of which provides that the board of directors may by a majority vote appoint an auditor who shall serve at the pleasure of the board, an auditor of a water district is a purely ministerial officer of the district, cannot in his official capacity dispute its existence or the validity of its organization, but must obey the orders of the board of directors regardless of his views as to their legality.

In Bank. Mandamus by the Marin Municipal Water District and others against William Dolge, Auditor of Marin Municipal Water District. Writ issued.

Geo. H. Harlan, of San Rafael (Curtis H. Lindley, of San Francisco, of counsel), for plaintiffs. Heller, Powers & Ehrman, of San Francisco (James L. Robison, of San Francisco, of counsel), for defendant.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus by the Marin municipal water district and its directors to compel William Dolge, as auditor of said district, to countersign certain bonds so that the same may be issued by said district.

The bonds were prepared for issue in pursuance of an election duly called and held for that purpose in accordance with the act authorizing the formation of such districts. Stats. 1911, p. 1290; Stats. Spec. Sess. 1911, p. 92. It is alleged that the bonds were presented to the auditor and he was asked to countersign the same but refused to do so.

The case comes clearly within the rule laid down in Los Angeles v. Leland, 157 Cal. 30, 106 Pac. 218. That was a proceeding in mandamus to compel the city clerk to certify to the passage of an ordinance for a special election to approve a proposed bond issue.

The court said:

"The city clerk is a purely ministerial officer whose duty it is to sign any and every ordinance which has been duly passed, regardless of any views he may entertain as to its legality or illegality. Mandate directed against the clerk for his refusal to sign an ordinance could properly go no further than to order him to perform his plain duty, and any discussion touching the legality or illegality, or the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the ordinance in question would be the merest obiter, binding upon no one, and not determinative of any rights."

The act authorizes the board, upon approval by a popular vote, to issue bonds of the district. It does not require that such bonds be countersigned by any officer, or at all. The necessity for countersigning these bonds arises solely from the fact that the board of directors needlessly directed that they should be countersigned by the auditor. Section 10 of the act provides that the board by majority vote shall appoint an auditor who "shall serve at the pleasure of the board." The board could therefore at any time remove the present auditor and appoint in his place some one who would obey its orders. Hence there is no necessity for any application to the courts. The thing sought could have been obtained in far less time if the board had merely exercised its own powers to accomplish its purpose.

[1-3] Manifestly, therefore, the real object of this proceeding was not to get the bonds countersigned, but to induce this court to consider and decide a number of questions argued in the briefs touching the constitutionality of the act, the validity of the organization of the district, and the regularity of the proceedings to issue the bonds. "A court will not decide a constitutional question unless such construction is absolutely necessary." Estate of Johnson, 139 Cal. 534, 73 Pac. 425, 96 Am. St. Rep. 161. The auditor, holding office as he does under authority of the district, cannot in his official capacity dispute its existence, or the validity of its organization. Ayers v. Newark, 49 N. J. Law, 174, 6 Atl. 659. Its validity cannot be questioned except in an action in quo warranto by or on behalf of the state. Keech v. Joplin, 157 Cal. 14, 106 Pac. 222; Quint v. Hoffman, 103 Cal. 506, 37 Pac. 514, 777. The auditor, like the city clerk in the Los Angeles case, is a purely ministerial officer of the district and he must obey the orders of the board of directors, regardless of his views on the above-mentioned questions.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

1. TROVER AND CONVERSION — 68 — JUDGMENT — SUPPORT BY FINDINGS.

In an action for the conversion of personal property, corporate stock and a note, in which two plaintiffs had interests, judgment for each of the plaintiffs in different sums was not supported by a finding of the combined value of the securities, not showing the value of the property in which each plaintiff alone was interested.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trover and Conversion, Cent. Dig. §§ 304-307; Dec. Dig. — 68.]

2. MONEY RECEIVED — 19(3) — JUDGMENT — SUPPORT BY FINDINGS.

A party interested in stock which was wrongfully sold, together with a note in which he had no interest, by a bank, could not support judgment for money received on the sale of the shares of stock on findings which did not show that any specific sum was received by the bank for such shares, since to recover in an action of assumpsit for property wrongfully sold plaintiff must show that a definite sum to which he is justly entitled has been received by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Money Received, Cent. Dig. § 78; Dec. Dig. — 19(3).]

3. MONEY RECEIVED — 3 — JUDGMENT — SUPPORT.

To support a judgment in assumpsit for money had and received, it was incumbent upon plaintiffs to show that the property in which they were respectively interested, and which was sold by a bank, realized the precise sums for which judgment was awarded them.

4. CONFUSION OF GOODS — 1 — APPLICATION OF DOCTRINE.

The doctrine of confusion of goods, whereby, under some circumstances, a defendant forfeits his right in goods which he has wrongfully intermingled with plaintiff's so that their separate interests cannot be ascertained or distinguished, has no application to the case of a wrongful sale together by a bank of corporate stock and a note in which two parties were interested, the one in the stock, and the other in the note, to enable one of them to recover, in an action for money had and received, the proceeds not only of the stock in which he was interested, but of the note.

Department 1. Action by G. Watson French against Lloyd M. Robbins, William H. High, the International Banking Corporation, James Alva Watt, Henry C. Stilwell, and others, in which Watt filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff and for the cross-complainant, defendants High and the banking corporation appeal, while defendant Robbins appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Judgment and order denying new trial reversed.

Richard Bayne, Horace W. Philbrook, and Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, all of San Francisco (Archibald Barnard and A. D. Plaw, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, Page, McCutchen & Knight, E. J. McCutchen, and Samuel Knight, all of San Francisco, for respondent. James Alva Watt, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

SLOSS, J. The trial of this action resulted in a judgment that plaintiff, French, recover from the defendants High, Robbins, and International Banking Corporation the sum of $15,295, with interest thereon from April 4, 1907, and that defendant and cross-complainant, Watt, recover from said defendants High, Robbins, and International Banking Corporation the sum of $5,000, with like interest. Various appeals have been taken and are presented in two records; transcripts having been filed in this court under the numbers, respectively, of S. F. No. 6709 and S. F. No. 6879. The defendants High and International Banking Corporation appeal from the judgment alone. Robbins appeals not only from the judgment, but from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The record in No. 6709, upon which alone the appellants High and International Banking Corporation rely, includes a reporter's transcript of the testimony, prepared and certified under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant Robbins has brought up, in addition, a bill of exceptions settled upon his motion for a new trial. All of the appeals are closely related, and will be considered in one opinion.

The general character of the controversy will appear from the following summary of the findings made by the court below:

International Banking Corporation, designated as the defendant Bank, was a corporation having a place of business in the city and county of San Francisco. High was the manager of the defendant Bank. Robbins was an attorney at law and the attorney for the defendant Bank and High. From and after April 13, 1906, Robbins was also, as the court finds, the attorney and trustee for plaintiff, a fact known to the defendant Bank and High. Prior to September 1, 1905, the defendant Stilwell was indebted to the Bank, and had executed and delivered to it an agreement pledging, as security for existing or future indebtedness, a certain promissory note made by the American Magnesite Company to Stilwell for $89,000, and any other collateral and securities that might thereafter be deposited, and authorizing the Bank to sell such note and securities without notice and at private sale for the repayment of said indebtedness. On or about September 5, 1905, Stilwell gave to Robbins an order on the defendant Bank for payment of the sum of $7,500, and directed the Bank to hold as security therefor all securities belonging to him (Stilwell) then in the possession of the Bank. Said order was indorsed by Robbins and by him delivered to the Bank. The only security belonging to Stilwell then held by the Bank was the promissory note of the American Magnesite Company for $89,000.

Plaintiff and Stilwell were both stockholders in said Magnesite Company. On January 27, 1906, they and other stockholders entered into an agreement to loan said Magnesite Company $125,000, of which plaintiff was to furnish $20,000, and Stilwell $25,000. A part of the agreement was that Stilwell was to have the defendant Bank surrender the $89,000 note and accept in place of it a new note of the Magnesite Company for $43,000. On the last-named day the defendant and Stilwell agreed with plaintiff that, if plaintiff would advance $25,000 to the Magnesite Company for him (Stilwell), he would secure the repayment of said loan, and he did assign to plaintiff all of the capital stock of Stilwell Coal Company, a corporation. The stock of said Stilwell Coal Company, all of which belonged to Stilwell, had prior thereto been pledged and deposited with the defendant Bank. Thereafter Stilwell borrowed from the Bank a further sum of $2,000, and deposited as security therefor under the collateral agreement above referred to all of the capital stock of the Paso Robles Water Company, a corporation which owned the waterworks of Paso Robles. In the month of February, 1906, Stilwell and one Miller owned an electric light plant at Paso Robles. Stilwell acquired the Miller interest, and formed a new corporation, the Paso Robles Light & Water Company, to which the property of the Paso Robles Water Company and the electric light plant were transferred. Stilwell was to receive and did receive three-fourths of the stock of this new corporation in exchange for the stock of the Water Company, and the remaining one-fourth was to be held by Miller as security for a payment due him. On April 13, 1906, the defendant Bank held in its possession all of the shares of the capital stock of the Paso Robles Water Company and the Stilwell Coal Company. On that date, in consideration of the advance by plaintiff to the Magnesite Company for defendant Stilwell of $25,000, Stilwell and Miller executed to the defendant Bank three writings which the latter accepted and agreed to. The one authorized the Bank to deliver 75 per cent. of the capital stock of the Paso Robles Water Company to Robbins as trustee for French "upon the payment of a promissory note executed by H. C. Stilwell for $2,000." This paper was signed by Stilwell and Miller. The second, signed by Stilwell, authorized the Bank to deliver to Robbins, as trustee for French, the shares of stock of the Stilwell Coal Company held by it. The third, signed by Miller, authorized the Bank to release the stock of the Stilwell Coal Company from any claims that he might have against it. At the same time, it is found, the parties agreed that payment of the sum of $2,000 mentioned in the first of these instruments should not precede the delivery of the shares of stock, but might be made at a later time; and all of the shares of stock referred to in said writings—i. e., the shares of the Paso Robles Water Company (afterwards exchanged for the shares of the Paso Robles Light and Water Company) and all of the shares of the Stilwell Coal Company—were transferred and delivered to Robbins, as trustee for plaintiff, and were thereby released from any lien or claim of lien thereon of the defendant Bank or Miller. Robbins thereafter, with the knowledge and consent of the Bank, High, and Stilwell, surrendered the stock of the Water Company and received all of the capital stock of the Paso Robles Light & Water Company. The stock of said company was issued in his name, as was the stock of the Stilwell Coal Company; all of said shares, however, being held by Robbins as trustee and attorney for plaintiff. In July, 1906, the Magnesite Company made and delivered to Stilwell its note for $43,000, payable in installments, and the same was indorsed by Stilwell and delivered to the bank, which thereupon surrendered the $89,000 note. The plaintiff paid to the Magnesite Company the $25,000 agreed to be advanced by him for Stilwell.

On January 11, 1907, Stilwell was indebted to the defendant Watt in the sum of $5,000 for legal services, and had also agreed to deliver him two bonds of the Magnesite Company. Watt was pressing for a settlement and threatening legal proceedings. On said January 11th Robbins, in order to induce Watt to forego proceedings, represented to him that there were no liens or claims on the $43,000 note other than that of the Bank, and Robbins and Watt and Stilwell agreed to a settlement whereby Stilwell gave Watt an order on the defendant Bank reading as follows:

"Please pay to James Alva Watt, or order, the sum of five thousand dollars, and hold as security for the same balance due me on a certain promissory note of the American Magnesite Company for $43,000.00. [Signed] H. C. Stilwell."

This order was indorsed by Watt and delivered by him to defendant High as manager of the defendant Bank, and the same was accepted by High as such manager, "for collection according to its terms." It is found that by said order Stilwell pledged to Watt the said $43,000 note, subject to the prior lien of the defendant Bank, and the Bank accepted said order as pledge holder of the said note after the payment of the sums due to it from Stilwell, and that Watt never waived any of his rights as pledgee. At the same time, it was agreed between Robbins and Watt, and their agreement was accepted and agreed to by High and the Bank, that any sums paid on the $43,000 note by the maker over and above the amount secured to be paid thereby to the defendant Bank should be apportioned and paid to Watt and Robbins in the proportions of two-fifths to Watt and three-fifths to Robbins. In accepting the said order from Watt, the Bank and High agreed to notify Watt of any acts or things thereafter affecting his security.

On January 15, 1907, the Magnesite Company defaulted in the payment of an installment of principal and interest due on the $43,000 note. On April 15, 1907, it again made default, and advised the Bank that it had no funds with which to meet said payments. No further payments of principal or interest were thereafter made.

The findings go on to state that plaintiff had given Robbins a general power of attorney and employed him as his attorney at law in connection with the plaintiff's interest in the capital stock of the Paso Robles Water Company, the Paso Robles Light & Water Company, and the Stilwell Coal Company. He had furnished Robbins with a bank credit of $5,000, and directed him to draw against the sum whenever necessary to pay the sum of $2,000 above referred to, and for protecting plaintiff's interests.

On March 31, 1907, the defendant Bank, through its manager, High, demanded of Robbins the return of the capital stock of the Stilwell Coal Company or payment of said sum of $2,000. The plaintiff was then absent from San Francisco, and Robbins, without advising or notifying plaintiff, and without drawing upon the funds which were at his disposition, and without any direction so to do, delivered to High and the defendant Bank certificates representing the entire capital stock of the Stilwell Coal Company and of the Paso Robles Light & Water Company. Thereupon, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, the defendants High and the Bank, with the knowledge and consent of Robbins, on the 4th day of April, 1907, without notice to plaintiff or to Watt or Stilwell, sold as a whole all of the securities hereinbefore mentioned, namely, the $43,000 note of the Magnesite Company, the stock of the Stilwell Coal Company and the stock of the Paso Robles Light & Water Company, together with one bond of the Magnesite Company, to one A. B. Bowers for the sum of $20,295.

The purchase price was paid by Bowers with his two promissory notes, one for $12,795, payable to the defendant Bank, and the other for $7,500, payable to Robbins. The last-mentioned note was indorsed by Robbins and delivered to defendant High and the Bank. Robbins then owed the Bank more than $7,500. Bowers thereafter paid the $12,795 note to the Bank in full, and at the same time paid said Bank the sum of $6,500 in full payment and satisfaction of the $7,500 note. This sum of $6,500 was applied by the bank in partial payment of the indebtedness of Robbins to it. Plaintiff had no notice of this sale until long after it had been made, and never consented thereto. Watt had no notice of the intention of the defendants Robbins, High, or the Bank to sell the $43,000 note or of any of the acts done in connection therewith until after the sale was fully consummated and the purchase price paid. He never consented thereto. It is found that the defendant Stilwell was at the date of said sale insolvent, and ever since has been, and that no part of the $25,000 advanced by plaintiff has ever been paid; likewise that no part of the $5,000 due to Watt has been paid. It is found that on April 4, 1907, the time of the sale of said securities, the plaintiff was entitled to possession as pledgee of all the capital stock of the Stilwell Coal Company and of three-fourths of the capital stock of the Paso Robles Light & Water Company as security for the payment to him from defendant Stilwell of the said sum of $25,000; that on said date defendants Robbins, High, and the Bank wrongfully converted the said stocks and all thereof to their own use, and that on said date the said coal and light and water stocks and said $43,000 Magnesite Company note were of the value of $20,295. The court found that on said April 4, 1907, Watt was, as High, Robbins, and the Bank well knew, the pledgee of the note of the Magnesite Company as security for the sum of $5,000, and the defendant Bank was the pledge holder of the said note as security for Watt, subject to the defendant Bank's prior lien, and that on said 4th day of April the defendants Robbins, High, and the Bank wrongfully converted to their own use the said promissory note and the whole thereof. The conclusions of law were that plaintiff and the defendant Watt were entitled to judgment against High, Robbins, and the Bank for the sums of $15,295 and $5,000, respectively, with interest and costs. As above stated, judgment was entered accordingly.

The appellant Robbins attacks many of the foregoing findings as unsupported. The appellants High and the Bank question the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings to the effect that Stilwell pledged the Magnesite note to Watt, and that the Bank became pledge holder for Watt. And, in so far as the findings relative to the relation between Watt and the Bank partake of the character of conclusions of law, all of the appellants make vigorous assault upon the trial court's view of the legal consequences resulting from the transactions between Watt, Robbins, Stilwell, and High. Certain rulings on the admission of evidence are questioned. But we do not find it necessary to go into any of these matters, as we are satisfied that the judgment cannot be supported upon the findings themselves, giving to those findings in every respect the interpretation demanded by the respondents. Reducing to their essentials the somewhat complicated transactions covered by the findings, and assuming those findings to be fully supported, we find this to be the state of facts: Stilwell owed the Bank $12,795. As security for this debt, the Bank held the note of the Magnesite Company for $43,000. Stilwell owed Watt $5,000, secured by a lien on the $43,000 note. Watt's lien was, however, subject to the prior claim of the Bank. The Bank held the note in pledge for its own claim and as pledge holder for Watt's claim.

Stilwell also owed the plaintiff, French, $25,000. This debt was secured by the stock of the Stilwell Coal Company and three-fourths of the stock of the Paso Robles Light & Water Company, all of which had been transferred to Robbins in trust for plaintiff. Robbins wrongfully turned the coal stock and the light and water stock over to the Bank, and High and the Bank wrongfully sold, for a single lump price of $20,295, the three items of property: (1 and 2) The coal stock and the light and water stock, on which plaintiff had a lien (but Watt had none); and (3) the Magnesite note, on which Watt had a lien (but plaintiff had none). There is no finding of the separate value of any of these three items of property. The sole finding is that the three together were of the value of $20,295.

[1] The findings declare that on the day of the sale the Bank, High, and Robbins converted to their own use the shares of stock and the note. Treating the action presented by the complaint of French and that embodied in the cross-complaint of Watt as suits for the conversion of personal property, the appellants contend that the judgment cannot stand for want of a sufficient finding of damage to the respective complainants. In other words, French, seeking relief for the conversion of his stock in the Coal Company and the Water & Light Company, must, as a basis for the recovery of damages, show the value of the property converted. C. C. § 3336. Similarly Watt, claiming that his interest in the Magnesite note had been converted, can recover damages for such conversion only upon proof of the value of the interest thus converted. No part of the property was owned in common by French and Watt. Their interests were several, and went to distinct items of property. A finding of the combined value of the three items does not show either the value of the property in which French was interested nor that of the property in which Watt claimed an interest. The judgment in favor of French for $15,295, and in favor of Watt for $5,000, is therefore not supported by the findings.

The correctness of this conclusion, if the action was one to recover damages for the conversion of personal property, is obvious. It is, indeed, not disputed by counsel for French. They contend, however, that the action is in reality one upon an implied or quasi contract, in which the plaintiff waived the tort committed by the wrongful sale of his property, and sued in assumpsit for the proceeds of such sale.

"If the defendant has converted the plaintiff's property, and in the act of conversion, or thereafter, sells the same, the plaintiff may, unless the question of title to land is involved in the controversy, waive the tort and sue in assumpsit, using the count for money had and received to recover the proceeds of the sale." Keener on Quasi Contracts, p. 170.

We need not go into an analysis of the pleadings to determine whether the complaint of French (or the cross-complaint of Watt) was so framed as to present a case under this theory. Granting that the case is of the character contended for by the respondents, they are still confronted by a difficulty very similar to that which would stand as an obstacle to the sustaining of the judgment, if the action were viewed as one for the recovery of damages for conversion.

[2] The foundation of the action of assumpsit, where property of plaintiff has been wrongfully taken and sold by the defendant, is the unjust enrichment of the wrongdoer. Keener on Quasi Contracts, p. 160. It is well settled that in order to recover in such an action the plaintiff must show that a definite sum, to which he is justly entitled, has been received by the defendant.

"As the amount of the plaintiff's recovery is limited to the proceeds received by the defendant, it will be fatal to this form of action that the amount is not ascertainable." Keener, Quasi Contracts, p. 173; Robson v. Andrade, 2 Chit. 263; Harvey v. Archbold, 3 Barn. & Cres. 626; Douglass v. Skinner, 44 Conn. 338.

In Saville v. Welch, 58 Vt. 683, 5 Atl. 491, a chest of tea belonging to plaintiff, together with other goods in which plaintiff had no interest, had been sold by the defendant for a lump sum. It was held that an action for money received could not be maintained, because it did not appear what portion of the money was received for the plaintiff's tea, and that the only remedy was trover for the conversion. Similarly, in Glasscock v. Hazell, 109 N. C. 145, 13 S. E. 789, the defendant, who had converted plaintiff's mill wheel, sold the wheel together with his own mill for a lump sum. It was held that the plaintiff could not "recover upon the implied contract—that is, for money had and received—as there was no testimony to show the amount obtained for the wheel by the defendant." See, also, Rand v. Nesmith, 61 Me. 111.

The principle of these authorities is directly in point here. The plaintiff, French, cannot, under the findings, support a judgment for money received by the appellants on the sale of the shares of stock, since it does not appear that any specific sum was received for such shares. They were sold, together with the note, for a lump sum of $20,295, and there is no suggestion of any means for determining what portion of this purchase price was paid for the shares of the stock. The same consideration applies to the judgment in favor of Watt. He has not shown that $5,000, or any other specific sum, was obtained on the sale of his interest in the Magnesite note.

[3] The respondents attempt to meet this objection by arguing that the plaintiff and Watt were together entitled to the entire proceeds of the sale of the three items of property, and that, as they are not questioning the manner in which such proceeds were apportioned between them, the appellants are in no position to complain. But this argument rests upon the false assumption that French and Watt were entitled to the entire proceeds of the sale. Watt had, if his theory of the effect of his transactions be accepted, at most, a lien on the note subordinate to that of the Bank. The Bank had a right to satisfy its own claim of $12,795 out of the proceeds of the note before anything became due to Watt. His right began only when a sum in excess of this had been realized. The judgment therefore cannot be supported upon the theory that the entire purchase price of $20,295 was in equity to be distributed between French and Watt. But, even if the Bank's prior lien on the note be disregarded, the position of the respondents is not bettered. Watt was not the owner of the note. He claimed merely a lien to the extent of $5,000. He was not entitled to any of the proceeds in excess of this sum, and French, as the findings declare, had no interest at all in the proceeds of the note. The division of the entire purchase price of the lump sale between the two respondents can be supported only upon the theory that the note brought no more than $5,000, and that the shares of stock brought $15,295. If the note brought more than $5,000, the shares brought less than the amount awarded to the plaintiff, French. To support the judgment for money had and received it was incumbent upon the respondents to show that the properties in which they were respectively interested realized the precise sums for which judgment was awarded them. This they did not do.

[4] The respondent French seeks to support the judgment by reference to the doctrine of "confusion of goods"; i. e., the rule which, under some circumstances, forfeits the right of a defendant in goods which he has wrongfully intermingled with those of the plaintiff, in such wise that the separate interests cannot be ascertained or distinguished. The Idaho, 93 U. S. 575, 23 L. Ed. 978. But the principle is not applicable to a case like the one before us. The shares of stock and the note were not of like character. They were always capable of being distinguished. The only "confusion" was in the proceeds of the sale, not in a mixture of the goods themselves. To allow the plaintiff, in an action for money had and received, to recover the proceeds, not only of his own goods, but of others in which he had no interest, would be inconsistent with the fundamental basis upon which this form of action rests, and in direct conflict with the authorities (Saville v. Welch, etc.) hereinabove cited.

The foregoing considerations require a reversal of the judgment and a remanding of the case for a new trial. The reversal of the judgment removes any occasion to consider separately the appeal from the order denying the motion of defendant Robbins for a new trial. We do not, of course, intimate any opinion regarding the merits of the many points argued in addition to those above discussed. Some of these depend upon evidence or findings of facts in addition to those mentioned in this opinion. The omission of any reference to these facts is not to be taken as expressing the view that they are not important.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

EHRHART et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 7452.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1916.)

MASTER AND SERVANT §419 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—AMENDMENT OF AWARD.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 293) § 25 (d), providing that Industrial Accident Commission shall have power to "re-scind, alter or amend" any order or award, in view of sections 25 (c), 81, 82, the commission, having awarded claimant compensation for an injured leg, cannot more than six months thereafter award such claimant compensation for injuries to a lung suffered in the same accident, which injuries had not been previously reported, since the six-months limitation prescribed by section 16 applies, except where indemnity has been paid or agreed upon as provided by section 16 (c).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. §419.]

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Certiorari by Karl Ehrhart and the New England Casualty Company against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and others to review an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Award annulled.

Samuel Knight, F. E. Boland, and James J. McKenna, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Certiorari to review the proceedings of the Industrial Accident Commission upon the application of Joe Salvatore. On March 24, 1914, Salvatore, who was employed by one Karl Ehrhart, was injured by the fall of a heavy timber. A bone of one of his legs was fractured and he also received a blow on the chest. No immediate disability resulted from the latter circumstance, and in considering the amount of compensation to be awarded the commissioners regarded only the injury to the leg.

Salvatore was in a hospital for 8 or 9 days immediately following the accident. He was then removed to his home in an open vehicle. Eleven days later pneumonia developed. For some time compensation was paid to him without application to the Industrial Accident Commission; but, a disagreement having arisen, Salvatore filed such an application. This was on June 18, 1914, and on July 29, 1914, findings and award were entered by the Industrial Accident Commission. It is not denied, but, on the contrary, is admitted by counsel representing the Industrial Accident Commission, that in Salvatore's application and at the hearings thereon no special mention was made of the injury to the applicant's chest or of the pneumonia which he had suffered; the award having been made solely for a disability which resulted from an injury to the employee's leg. Compensation was paid to Sal-vatore to and including August 12, 1914, when he returned to work.

On February 10, 1915, more than 10 months after the accident, Joe Salvatore wrote a letter to the Industrial Accident Commission. In this communication were statements to the effect that he had secured new witnesses who had not testified at the previous hearings; that since the time of settlement he had developed pains which had led to hemorrhages attributed by his doctors to the accident; and that the first severe hemorrhage had occurred November 10, 1914. As a result of this letter the Industrial Accident Commission held a hearing, after notice to the parties interested, and on April 7, 1915, awarded compensation to Joe Salvatore for disability resulting from a diseased lung.

The petitioners here, who are the employer of Salvatore and the insurance company that paid the compensation under the original award, contend that the Industrial Accident Commission acted in excess of its powers in granting a new hearing on the basis of the letter of February 8, 1915, because it was not filed within 6 months of the happening of the accident; that the commission acted in excess of its powers in deciding that the later disability arose out of the employment; and that said commission exceeded its powers in deciding that there was an unbroken chain of causation between the original injury and the disability following the diseased condition of Salvatore's lung.

Section 16 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act fixes a general limitation of 6 months from the time of the accident within which period application for compensation must be made by the person injured; but section 16 (c) provides that payment of the indemnity or any part thereof or agreement therefor shall have the effect of extending the period within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced 6 months from the date of the agreement or last payment of such indemnity. It is the contention of the petitioners for the writ that Salvatore sought to collect an indemnity more than 6 months after the date of the alleged accident and injury to his chest and that the collection of the entire indemnity for the disability arising from the injury to his leg did not extend the period of limitation within which the application to the Industrial Accident Commission must be made.

The application filed on June 18, 1914, asked compensation for an injury to the leg of the applicant. There was no mention therein or in the award of July 29, 1914, of any injury other than or different from the one mentioned in the application, and it fully appears from the record that there was at the original hearing no evidence nor suggestion of any injury to any part of Salvatore's anatomical structure except his leg, although at that time he had suffered from the pneumonia which, according to the theory invoked for the support of the later award, was of the same traumatic origin as that specified as the basic cause of his present condition.

Counsel for the Industrial Accident Commission does not seek to support the second hearing and award by section 81 of the statute under which that body acts, said section operating, he believes, only when some one aggrieved has applied for a rehearing, and he asserts that section 82 has no application to this case except that subsection (b) thereof emphasizes the continuing jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission over its awards vested by section 25 (d). We are in entire accord with learned counsel in these views, and agree with him that the power of the commission to make the second award (if any such authority existed) must be justified and upheld, if at all, under said section 25 (d), which is as follows:

"The commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions and awards made and entered under the provisions of sections 12 to 35, inclusive, of this act and may at any time, upon notice, and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor: Provided, that no award of compensation shall be rescinded, altered or amended after 245 weeks from the date of the accident. Any order, decision or award rescinding, altering or amending a prior order, decision or award shall have the same effect as is herein provided for original orders, decisions or awards." Stats. 1913, p. 293.

Before discussing the section last quoted it is proper that we consider the purpose of section 16 (c), providing that payment of the disability indemnity extends the time of its collection. The other parts of the sixteenth section indicate the policy of the Legislature that any one seeking indemnity for injuries arising from an accident must present his claims to the Industrial Accident Commission within 6 months of the accident. But the Legislature wisely provided against the injustice which might be done if by voluntary payments the employer should induce an injured servant to forego his right to seek redress at the hands of the Industrial Accident Commission until the passage of the period of limitation and then refuse further compensation. Subsection (c) was passed to guard against the possibility of such sharp practice.

It was not, we believe, the intention of the lawmakers to open the statute of limitations and to extend it beyond the period of six months for the purpose of enabling a claimant to present an entirely new case based upon the alleged results of an injury which had never before been called to the attention of the commissioners. To hold otherwise would be to make the statute an instrument for the encouragement of false claims or those based upon remote and unsatisfactory speculation and peradventure regarding the cause of a disability manifesting itself long after the happening of the accident. One of the purposes of the time limit imposed by the various subdivisions of section 16 was to cause an early submission to the commissioners of the injuries to the employé, so that the commissioners by their own observation and with the aid of expert testimony might determine, not only the condition of the applicant at that time, but the probable future results of the accident. This policy is manifest from the fact that where no disability has occurred at the time of the hearing, but is likely to do so in the future, the commission may retain jurisdiction. Section 25 (c). In other words, prompt inquiry regarding the injuries in all their details by the commission was evidently intended by the lawmakers.

Section 25 (d) gives to the commission continuing jurisdiction over its orders, decisions, and awards, and it permits that after notice and hearing any order, decision, or award may be rescinded, altered, or amended. But the second award was not a rescission, alteration, nor amendment of the original order. It was an entirely new judgment, based upon proof of an injury that was not investigated nor mentioned at the first hearing. Let us suppose, by way of illustration, that after Salvatore's leg had healed, and he had returned to work, he should have suffered with necrosis of the bone in the vicinity of the fracture. It would have been perfectly proper for the Industrial Accident Commission to have investigated the second disability, and to have determined the facts from the record made at the original hearing and the evidence adduced at the later inquiry, and, if justified by those facts, to have ordered a resumption of payment of an indemnity. In that case there would have been in the possession of the commission a record of facts adduced before the memory of the accident had become dim, and before intervening causes might have operated possibly to produce disability. The new order would, in such a case, be a modification or amendment of the prior award. But the order made in this proceeding upon the second hearing was just as foreign to the original one as if the commissioners had been dealing with a different individual. One of the objects of an early investigation of the circumstances of an accident and its results to the person injured is to give the responsible employer a chance to alleviate the condition of his servant, to the end that the latter may the sooner be restored to full capacity for labor and the former relieved of the duty of paying indemnity. If the injured person conceals some of the injuries from the commission, and even from his attending physician, the employer is deprived of the chance of offering to him appropriate medical or surgical attention.

Another object of a prompt investigation of the results of an accident is to put the commission and the indemnitor in a position to discover any attempt either unduly to extend the period of payment or to fix upon the employer the burden of paying for the results of a later casualty. Thus it will be readily apparent that, if an applicant to the Industrial Accident Commission may reveal the extent and location of his injuries partly at one hearing and partly at another, many months later, the employer will be placed at a very grave disadvantage. Suppose that two men are injured by the same instrumentality at the same time. One suffers a broken leg; the other, a blow upon the side. Within six months the man whose bone was broken applies to and receives compensation under an award by the Industrial Accident Commission. The other suffers disability after the lapse of 6 months. Under the statute his claim is barred, and for the reason that the Legislature has established the limit of time to compel an early submission to the Industrial Accident Commission of all injuries. Where both hurts are inflicted upon the same person, the principle is no different, if the patient sees fit to withhold from the commissioners and the indemnitor all information regarding some of his injuries.

From the foregoing discussion it follows that the Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction to make the second award. This conclusion relieves us of all necessity for examining critically the contention which the petitioners so earnestly make that no causal connection was proven between the accident and the diseased condition of the applicant which was shown to exist at the time of the second hearing.

The award under review is annulled.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; HENSHAW, J.; SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. I do not think that the Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction to make a supplemental award. It would be more in keeping with the purposes and tenor of the act to hold that once the commission is vested with jurisdiction to deal with disability resulting from an accident it retains jurisdiction until the disability ceases, or the period of 245 weeks from the date of the accident has expired, irrespective of whether the disability is continuous or recurrent, or results from one or more injuries caused by the same accident, or whether, in the case of more than one injury, the disability manifests itself at the same or at different times. Compensation is not given for an injury caused by accident but for the disability resulting therefrom. See section 15. In this behalf, it will be observed that the commission did not specifically mention the injury to the leg in its findings, but found that the applicant "was injured by accident" and "that by reason of said accident and injury, applicant sustained a temporary total disability." The award was made "as a temporary total disability indemnity because of an injury sustained by accident." And in making the supplemental award compensation was allowed, not for any specific injury, as, for instance, the blow on the chest, but "as a further indemnity by reason of a temporary total disability, * * * caused by the accident and injury forming the basis of this proceeding." The Legislature, as the respondents point out, has not defined disabilities resulting from accidental means. The act merely classifies disabilities arising from accident as temporary, permanent, partial, or total. Section 15b. It is clearly intended by the act to provide compensation for all disability which extends beyond the first two weeks following the accident. Id.

In this case the injured employé did institute proceedings within six months from the date of the accident. In my opinion the jurisdiction thus vested continued in legal effect so as to cover any other disability resulting from the identical accident, for the injury to the leg and the blow on the chest were simultaneously caused by the fall of the timber.

It is not questioned but that if the injury to the chest, which ultimately caused disability, had been brought to the attention of the commission when the applicant appeared before it, or even after the first award had been made but within six months from the date of the accident or the last voluntary payment of compensation, he would have been entitled to a nominal disability indemnity therefor (section 25c), and for that purpose to have the award, if already made, amended. But it is insisted that as compensation for the disability resulting from the injury to the chest was not so claimed the commission is without jurisdiction to act in the premises. This is tantamount to holding that the full effect of the accident must be known by the applicant and reported by him within the statutory period, and, if not, compensation cannot be allowed. It seems to me that this conclusion rests upon a technical and narrow construction which is opposed to the whole spirit of the act.

"Whenever this act, or any part or section thereof, is interpreted by a court, it shall be liberally construed by such court." Section 86a.

Section 77a provides:

"All hearings and investigations before the Commission or any member thereof, or any referee appointed thereby, shall be governed by this act and by the rules of practice and procedure adopted by the commission, and in the conduct thereof neither the commission nor any member thereof nor any referee appointed thereby shall be bound by the technical rules of evidence. No informality in any proceeding or in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any order, decision, award, rule or regulation made, approved or confirmed by the commission."

The act contains no express provision that each particular injury must be described or made known within the said period, but merely requires, in this connection, notice as to the "nature of the injury" (section 20), and "the general nature of any dispute or controversy concerning compensation, or concerning any right of liability arising out of, or incident thereto" (section 22). As sections 25d and 82b do not specify the instances in which jurisdiction may be continued, in my view it should be held that the continuing jurisdiction applies to any case where jurisdiction is once vested by reason of disability resulting from accident, and that if there be a further disability, as contended here, compensation for such further disability must be allowed, even though it be traced to an injury not expressly contemplated by the original award.

Nor do I think there is any proper basis of comparison between this applicant and the injured employé in the given illustration who fails to make any report of his accident to the commission within the statutory period. The former put the law into motion following the accident and seasonably challenged full investigation into his injured condition, while the latter fails to exercise his rights. The commission had authority to act in the one case; it had no opportunity to act in the other.

As against the finding of the commission this court can hardly hold that there was no causal connection between the injury to the chest and the tuberculosis. In the absence of fraud, or willful concealment—and neither is suggested by the circumstances of this case—it will be presumed that the blow on the chest did not lead the applicant to anticipate until after the period of six months had expired that it would result in disability.

Keeping the objects of the statute in mind, it does not seem just that the injured employé should be foreclosed because he failed to apply to the commission for additional relief within six months from the date of the accident or last voluntary payment of disability indemnity. In its hearings the commission had ample opportunity to question the applicant fully as to the nature and extent of his injuries. This was not done, and no question was put to him either on behalf of the commission, the employer, or the insurer which would call for a disclosure of any other injury than the one to the foot. The act provides, also, that the applicant shall submit to an examination by physicians selected by the employer. Section 21. The applicant was so examined. He was also questioned by the physician for the commission. These examinations, however, were apparently confined to the condition of the injured foot, and no inquiry was made directly or indirectly of the applicant as to any other injury, although all parties had knowledge of the circumstances of the accident, and particularly that the applicant had been struck by a heavy timber which rendered him helpless. And it is not to be presumed that the applicant would not have answered truthfully questions concerning the blow on the chest if any had been put to him.

I think the construction placed upon the act by the majority opinion in the particulars discussed will tend to defeat the purpose and aims of the legislation. It is the plain import of the statute to dispense with the formalities and delays that attend upon ordinary litigation, to avoid or minimize the expense of employing counsel, and to confer upon the commission plenary power to efficiently and promptly deal with the claims of injured employés who are not expected to have an astute understanding of the provisions of the act, and who must depend upon the commission to guide them through the requirements thereof in securing all the disability indemnity to which they are rightfully entitled.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by John Wesley Gibbons against the Yosemite Lumber Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Order reversed.

Ostrander, Tuttle & Ostrander, of Merced, J. W. Dorsey, of San Francisco, and J. J. Griffin, of Merced, for appellants. F. W. Henderson and Brickley & Schino, all of Merced, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The action involves the ownership of a tract of 40 acres of land situate in Merced county. The judgment declares that plaintiff is the owner of the property. The defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The appellants attack the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings bearing on the issue of title. It is conceded that in 1888 John L. Ivett was the owner of the land. The record title remained in Ivett until his death, which occurred in 1890. Thereafter it passed, by mesne conveyances, to the Yosemite Lumber Company. The defendants Spears, Blake, and Minor, as trustees of the Merced Falls School district, claim a part of the tract under a conveyance made by the Yosemite Lumber Company since the commencement of this action.

The plaintiff never received any conveyance or other written instrument from Ivett. He relied on adverse possession, and on an oral agreement between Ivett and himself. During Ivett's life stockmen driving bands of sheep toward the mountains were in the habit of grazing their animals on the lands through which they passed. Ivett was the owner of large tracts adjoining the 40 acres in controversy. The plaintiff introduced testimony tending to show that in 1888 Ivett agreed that he would deed this 40-acre piece to him, if he (plaintiff) would go on the land and keep the sheep off of Ivett's remaining lands for a period of two years. Pursuant to this understanding, Gibbons built a house, two chicken houses, a toilet, and a barn on the land in controversy, and moved on it. He has lived there with his family ever since. There was testimony that he complied with his agreement by requiring sheepmen to keep their sheep off of Ivett's land for two years. Before any conveyance had been made Ivett died. The 40-acre tract was not fenced, and Gibbons never paid any taxes on it. The taxes were paid by the defendants or their predecessors in interest. The only testimony regarding Gibbons' use of the land was his own statement that he "had his milk cows on it and horses and whatever he wanted to turn on it"; that he "grazed on it."

[1-3] The evidence was entirely insufficient to support the finding that plaintiff was the owner of the land. Title to real estate cannot, of course, be transferred except by an instrument in writing (Civ. Code, § 1091; Fudickar v. East Riverside Irr. Dist., 109

Cal. 29, 41 Pac. 1024; Moore v. Hamerstag, 109 Cal. 122, 41 Pac. 805), or by such adverse possession as would be sufficient to create title by prescription. There was no adequate showing of a title by adverse possession. The plaintiff had never paid the taxes levied and assessed upon the land, and such payment has ever since 1878 been an essential element of adverse possession under our Code. Code Civ. Proc. § 325. There is no occasion, therefore, to inquire whether there was a sufficient showing of the actual occupancy of the entire 40 acres necessary to constitute adverse possession in a case like this, where the claim of ownership is not founded upon a written instrument, judgment, or decree. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 324, 325.

[4] The finding that plaintiff is the owner of the land is therefore unsupported. It is argued by respondent that the judgment in his favor may be supported on the theory that the defendants acquired the legal title with notice of his equities, and that he is entitled to a decree compelling them to convey. A conveyance so ordered would, it is said, leave the parties in substantially the position in which the judgment already entered places them.

It may be that there has been such partial performance of an oral contract to convey as would meet the defense of the statute of frauds, and that the plaintiff could establish a right to have the agreement specifically enforced. But the pleadings are not so framed as to present the issues embraced in an action for specific performance. The relief sought and granted was the determination of an existing title. There was no attempt to compel compliance with a contract to convey. A decree for specific performance cannot be supported in the absence of allegation and finding that the contract was just and reasonable and the consideration adequate. Civ. Code, § 3391; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193. If the plaintiff desires to assert his right to have the legal title conveyed to him, his only course is to seek this relief by appropriate pleadings directed to that end, either in a new action or by application to the court below for leave to file an amended complaint. We are not, of course, expressing any opinion on the question whether such leave should or should not be granted. Nor, we may add, are we intimating any view regarding the sufficiency of the evidence to show that the appellants, successors to Ivett's title, took with such notice of plaintiff's claim as would make their ownership subject to plaintiff's rights under the alleged contract.

The order denying a new trial is reversed.

PEOPLE v. BERGOTINI. (Cr. 1955.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1916.)

INFANTS — 20 — CONTRIBUTION TO DELINQUENCY—STATUTE.

In a prosecution for contributing to the dependency of minors, the information, alleging that defendant induced the minors' mother to assume meretricious relations with him, and also that previously, on account of her depravity, the children had been in danger of growing up to lead idle, dissolute, and immoral lives, did not state the offense within Juvenile Court Law (St. 1913, p. 1303) § 28.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. — 20.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Frank Bergotini was convicted of crime, and from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The offense sought to be charged in the information was contributing to the dependency of certain minors. The charging part of the information was as follows:

"The said Frank Bergotini on or about the 4th day of July, A. D. one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, and for eight months next prior thereto, at and in the county of Sonoma, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully contribute to the dependency of dependent children as follows: That at all times herein mentioned, and now, Doris Cavalli, Ellen Cavalli, Virginia Cavalli, and Alice Cavalli were minor children all under the age of 11 years, and the children of A. Cavalli and Irene Cavalli, their parents, and at all times herein mentioned said children were dependent children, and their home at Petaluma, in said county of Sonoma, state of California, was during said time, by reason of the neglect and depravity of Irene Cavalli, the mother of said children, and by reason of the personal depravity of their said mother, an unfit home for said children, and that the said children are and at all times herein mentioned have been in danger of growing up to lead idle, dissolute, and immoral lives; that A. Cavalli is and during all of the times herein mentioned has been in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess, often going to his home in an intoxicated condition, and being and remaining in an intoxicated condition in the presence of his said children in his said home; that on or about the 15th day of November, 1913, the said Irene Cavalli began living and having immoral relations with one Frank Bergotini, and ever since has continued to sustain and live in immoral relations towards said Frank Bergotini, and thereby neglected and abandoned said children and said home. Said Irene Cavalli was during all of said time encouraged and induced to neglect and abandon said children and said home and to live in immoral and depraved relations with said Frank Bergotini with the consent, request, and approval of the said Frank Bergotini, and that on or about the 23d day of February, 1914, in the county of Sonoma, the said Irene Cavalli, at the request and encouragement of said Frank Bergotini, deserted and abandoned her said children as aforesaid, and has since continued to desert and abandon and neglect said children and leave them without a proper or fit home and to lead an immoral life with said Frank Bergotini, and that by reason of the acts of the said defendant as aforesaid, and by reason of the neglect, desertion, and abandonment of the said children as aforesaid by Irene Cavalli, the mother of said children, which said neglect, desertion, and abandonment has been encouraged, abetted, and contributed to by said defendant as aforesaid, and by reason of the habitual intemperance of A. Cavalli, the father of said children, said children have no parent or guardian willing and capable, or willing or capable of exercising proper parental control of said children, and for want of such proper parental control said children are wayward and addicted to vicious habits, and are in danger of being brought up to lead idle, dissolute, and immoral lives. * * *

The defendant's counsel duly demurred to this information on numerous grounds. The demurrer should have been sustained, for reasons which we shall presently discuss.

Section 28 of the Juvenile Court Law (Stats. of 1913, p. 1303) contains the following language:

"Any person who shall commit any act or omit the performance of any duty, which act or omission causes or tends to cause, encourage or contribute to the dependency or delinquency of any person under the age of twenty-one years, as defined by any law of this state, * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. * * *

Section 3 of the same act defines the condition of a dependent person. For the purposes of this case we need only consider the first and eighth subdivisions of that section, which provide that a "dependent person" shall include any person:

"(1) Who has no parent or guardian willing to exercise, or capable of exercising proper parental control, and for the want of such proper parental control such person is wayward and addicted to vicious habits, and is in danger of being brought up to lead an idle and dissolute, or immoral life;" "(8) who from any cause of personal depravity is in danger of growing up to lead an idle and dissolute, or immoral life."

The information does not set forth the acts of immorality committed by Bergotini and Mrs. Cavalli, but, assuming that they were adulterous acts, there is no pleading to the effect that such acts were committed in the presence of the children or that they had any direct effect upon the morals of the minors. Stripped of details, the story of the pleading seems to be this: Cavalli was a drunkard who frequently went home in an intoxicated state and was seen by his children in that condition. Bergotini induced the mother of the children to have improper sexual relations with him, and finally to leave her home and to live with him in an adulterous relation. The children, lacking parental control, are therefore in danger of growing up to lead idle and dissolute or immoral lives. But the pleader also alleged that at all times mentioned in the information, that is, between November 13, 1913, and July 4, 1914, the home of Irene Cavalli was by reason of her personal depravity an unfit place for the children. It is clear therefore that Bergotini is not charged with any offense operating directly upon the children. The prosecuting officer sought to charge him with crime because of a condition created by reason of his immoral relations with the mother. It is impossible to tell from the pleading whether his fault lay in causing her to violate her marriage vows and thus to become an unfit person to associate with her children while she remained at home or in persuading her to leave home, or both. A defendant is entitled, under any statute, to a clear statement of the offense with which he is charged. It is urged that the statute itself is unconstitutional because it is not in its terms sufficiently certain to show what the legislators intended to prohibit and punish. 12 Cyc. 141. The act constituting an offense should be clearly described in the statute with sufficient certainty to enable the court to determine, from the words used, whether or not the act charged comes within the prohibition of the law. State v. Mann, 2 Or. 241. But it is not necessary here to pass upon the constitutional question raised by appellant. Assuming that the act is constitutional, the information does not allege distinctly how the defendant contributed to the delinquency of the children. If his relations with their mother before she deserted them caused her to become so immoral that she influenced them to be depraved, there is no sufficient allegation to that effect. It is not stated how his evil influence operated upon them. If the information is to rest upon the theory that taking her to live with him deprived the children of a fit and proper home, that is negatived by the previous allegations that the home was unfit and improper for them before her departure, and, even if such averments were lacking, there is no pleading that she could have provided a proper home for them if his malign influence had not operated upon her affections. If the taking of the woman away from the home is the gist of the offense, then the immorality of the inducement is not material, and an employer who, knowing that she had young children and a drunken husband, induced her to accept a position in a place away from home, would be just as guilty as her paramour. We cannot so construe the act. The statute must have contemplated some offense having not merely a possible but an inevitable effect upon the minor.

The prosecution apparently placed strong reliance upon the case of State v. Dunn, 53 Or. 304, 99 Pac. 278, 100 Pac. 258, in which the court held that it was unnecessary to charge or prove that the minor was in fact dependent. But, even if we assume that the doctrine announced by the Supreme Court of Oregon in the decision of that case is correct, the facts were so different that it is not authority which aids in the determination of the questions presented by this appeal. The act charged in the information in that case operated directly upon the minor. It was an attempt on the part of the defendant to seduce the minor child. If successful, it would have made her a "delinquent," and manifestly the very attempt to seduce her tended to make her a member of that class.

If this information were to be upheld, it would be impossible to foresee what application juries might make of this law to persons having some remote possible connection with the delinquency or dependency of minors. The dealers who sold Cavalli liquor, the manufacturers who may have adulterated the intoxicants, thereby increasing the potency of the drinks, the farmers who raised the materials out of which the intoxicants were manufactured, and the builders of the machinery for the making of the liquors—all of these might be indicted as contributing in some degree to the delinquency of these minors, the conviction of the defendants depending largely upon the prejudice and the imagination of the jurors. We might add for good measure the truant officer who may have failed to compel the attendance of the children at school. We cannot think that the Legislature intended the wide scope which the prosecution sought to give to the Juvenile Court Act. We conclude, therefore, that the court erred in failing to sustain the demurrer.

Nevertheless we have examined the evidence adduced at the trial. While it indicates that the children used profanity and at times exposed themselves rather shamelessly to strangers, there was no showing that their moral condition was made worse because of defendant's connection with the Cavalli family. At the time of the trial the Cavallis were separated in accordance with the terms of a written agreement giving the father full control of the children. Three of the minors were in an orphan asylum which was under church government, and the youngest was with its maternal grandmother. There can be little doubt that the defendant was found guilty because of his adultery—an offense for which, as such, he was not on trial.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

I concur on the ground last stated: SHAW, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I concur in the judgment. I am of the opinion that the information fails to state a public offense within the meaning of section 28 of the so-called Juvenile Court Law of the year 1913, the only statute relied on by the prosecution as covering the matter. It seems to me that to give this section such a construction as would support the information herein, or sustain this conviction, on the evidence introduced on the trial, would necessarily attribute to the Legislature the intent thereby to make any act or omission that in fact causes or tends to cause, encourage, or contribute, however remotely, to the dependency or delinquency of a minor, a crime.

So far as the defendant himself is concerned, the information substantially charges only that the mother of the alleged dependent children, in the home of herself, her husband, and the children, sustained and lived "in immoral relations" with said defendant, with his consent, request, and approval, "and thereby neglected and abandoned said children," and that finally, at the request and encouragement of defendant, she deserted and abandoned her children to live an immoral life with defendant, leaving the children without a proper or fit home. There is not the slightest suggestion that any alleged "immoral relations" were in the presence or with the knowledge of any of the children. The only suggested consequence thereof was that by reason thereof the mother "neglected and abandoned said children and said home." And as to her finally leaving the home where her husband and children remained it is alleged simply that she did this at the request and encouragement of the defendant. In other words, all that is alleged against defendant is that as a consequence of his relation with the mother of the children she at first neglected them, and finally, at his request and because of his encouragement, she left her home, with the result that she deserted and abandoned the children, and thereby failed in the performance of her duties toward them. Whatever act or omission there was directly causing, or tending to cause, encourage, or contribute to the alleged dependency of the children was the act or omission of the mother alone. Defendant did nothing in their presence or elsewhere directly accomplishing any such result. Whatever he personally did began and ended with the mother, and was not directed toward any of the children. The only possible basis of any claim of act or omission causing, tending to cause, encouraging, or contributing to the alleged dependency is solely the act or omission of the mother in neglecting and abandoning her children. The only connection of the defendant therewith is that she, the mother, may have done this in consequence of her relations with him.

I am satisfied that the statute before us may not reasonably be construed as including any such case. It is entirely fair and permissible to construe it as referring exclusively to acts or omissions done or made directly with relation to the minor child. No case has been cited, and I have been able to find none, involving any other kind of an act or omission. For instance, one willfully commits lascivious acts in the presence of a child capable of comprehension, or toward such a child, or has immoral relations with a child, or does with relation to the child any of the very numerous things that may directly cause, tend to cause, or contribute to, its dependency; such acts or omissions are clearly within the scope of the statute. But something done solely with relation to somebody else, in no way directly affecting the child, may not fairly be held within its scope. And it can make no difference in this connection whether the thing so done is immoral, as in the case at bar, or absolutely free from blame.

I agree in the conclusion also that the evidence utterly failed to show a case which warrants a conviction under the statute invoked. As is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice MELVIN, "there can be little doubt that the defendant was found guilty because of his adultery—an offense for which, as such, he was not on trial."

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by Theda R. Conaway and another against Lyman D. Toogood and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Williams & Rutan, of Santa Ana, for appellants. Tipton & Cailor, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is an action to recover damages claimed by the plaintiffs to have been suffered by them through the acts of the defendants in interfering with their enjoyment and use of an alleged private right of way, and to perpetually enjoin the defendants from so interfering. The case was tried without a jury. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs decreeing their right to maintain and use the right of way, 18 feet in width, as described by metes and bounds, and forever restraining and enjoining the defendants from obstructing or destroying the said right of way or interfering with plaintiffs in their use thereof. The defendants interposed a motion for a new trial which was denied on condition that the plaintiffs grant to Lyman D. Toogood, one of the defendants, a release and quitclaim deed to the north six feet of the said way. Upon the tender of the said release and quitclaim deed, an order was made denying the motion for a new trial. It was further decreed that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover their costs nor any damages. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

1. The principal question involved in the appeal is whether the claimants are entitled to a right of way over the lands described. It is alleged in the amended complaint that a right of way 24 feet wide had been acquired by purchase and by prescription, extending westward from the dominant tenement, which is the land owned by the claimants, along the line separating the two contiguous parcels of land owned by the defendants, Toogood and Hanes, respectively, and that the said right of way was the only means of ingress and egress to and from the claimants' land. In other words, the claimants assert that the northern half or 12 feet of the strip constituting the right of way extended along the southern line of the Toogood property, while the southern half or 12 feet extended along the northern line of the Hanes property, so that the center of the right of way represented the boundary line between the respective lands of the defendants. There was a conflict of evidence on the question whether any portion of the alleged right of way did, in fact, extend along the property owned by the defendant Hanes. The claimants introduced evidence tending to prove that the fence, which inclosed the southern line of the right of way, was located 12 feet south of the north line of the Hanes property. But Hanes testified that he regarded the said fence as being practically on his north line. The court found, in this connection, that the fence on the south side of the right of way has been recognized and accepted by Hanes as constituting his north line. The court further found that the allegations of the complaint that the right of way was secured by purchase are not true. This finding is not attacked. But the court did find that the claimants were entitled to a right of way by prescription, and awarded judgment in their favor for the southern 18-foot strip of the 24-foot strip claimed by them, and then, as already stated, upon the denial of the motion for a new trial, modified the judgment so as to include only the southern 12 feet of the alleged 24-foot strip of land.

[1] It is the contention of the defendants that the claimants have acquired no rights by prescription over the land now owned by defendant Toogood because their possession and use of the way, so far as Toogood and his predecessors in interest are concerned, arose out of a mere neighborly accommodation. There was evidence tending to support this contention. One Bentley, who was the owner of the dominant tenement in 1886, about which time the use of the way commenced, testified that he had arranged with the then owners of the servient tenement, now the Toogood property, to permit the latter to plow up and cultivate the existing road which extended to the north from his land along the eastern line of the servient tenement, in exchange for the privilege, on his part, of traveling out from his land to the west, instead of northward, to the public highway. The defendants claim both parties to this arrangement had always understood it to be merely a matter of accommodation which should create no legal rights whatever. Pinheiro v. Bettencourt et al., 17 Cal. App. 111, 118 Pac. 941; Davis v. Martin, 157 Cal. 657, 108 Pac. 866. Thereafter Bentley commenced traveling over the way to the west, and subsequently the owners of the Toogood property erected a fence on the north side of the way. Meanwhile the road to the north was closed up and abandoned by Bentley, while an Osage orange hedge along the road was cut down and the land placed under cultivation. It is contended by the claimants that, whatever the parties to the arrangement may have regarded as the legal status of the matter, the evidence in the case clearly indicates that there never was any intention of abandoning the road to the west and re-establishing the one to the north. The court found on this point that the owners of the Toogood property "had knowledge of said use, acquiesced therein, and understood that it was being used by said Bentley adversely and under a claim of right." The question as to whether or not the use of a right of way has been adverse and under a claim of legal right so to do, or a mere matter of neighborly accommodation, is a question of fact to be determined by the jury, or the court sitting without a jury, from all the facts and circumstances of the case. Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 Pac. 10; Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 205, 63 Pac. 361; Abbott v. Pond, 142 Cal. 393, 76 Pac. 60.

[2-4] 2. But it is not necessary to rest this case upon the nature of Bentley's use of the right of way; for, in our opinion, the acts of his successors in interest were sufficient to support the court in finding a prescriptive right in favor of the claimants, regardless of the fact that such use, in its origin, may have rested upon permission or license. In 1887, John H. Cole became the owner of the dominant tenement, purchasing it from Bentley. At the time he took possession of the property, he found the road to the west the only apparent means of ingress to and egress from his land. The road to the north had been closed some years previously, and, except for the mention in the deed, there was nothing to show that it had formerly existed. His wife testified that she did not know there ever was a roadway running north from the land. To the defendants' contention that Cole had never asserted a claim of right to use the way to the west, Cole testified, in effect, that he had always assumed that he had a right to travel over the southern part of the Toogood property, and had not asked for the privilege of using it, but had continued to make use of it, without protest on the part of the owners of the servient tenement, as the sole means of entering upon and leaving his land, until he conveyed it to the claimants. Upon assuming possession of the dominant tenement, Cole plowed and graded the way to the west, rebuilt and maintained fences along both sides, excavated a ditch about five feet in width along the north side of the roadway, either constructed or reconstructed a bridge at the end nearest the public highway, and, as the court found, some time about the year 1890 began using a strip of land, immediately south of, in addition to, and adjoining the way theretofore used by himself and Bentley. Whatever may have been the interest of his grantor in the right of way, these overt acts of Cole negative a recognition on his part of the superior right of the owners of the servient tenement, and are consistent only with a claim of right to use the way, adverse to the interests of such owners. See Humphreys v. Blasingame, 104 Cal. 40, 37 Pac. 804; Barnes et al. v. Daveck, 7 Cal. App. 487, 94 Pac. 779. Notice of a disclaimer of the owner's interest and the assertion of a claim of adverse right of way over the land may be inferred from notorious acts. See Oglesby v. Hollister, 76 Cal. 136, 18 Pac. 146, 9 Am. St. Rep. 177. According to the evidence, this use of the right of way was continued by Cole from the time he took possession of the land for about eight years in person, through his tenants thereafter until December 2, 1910, and then by the claimants themselves, during all of which time there were no acts or declarations by the owners of the servient tenement indicating an assertion of the right to in any way control such use.

[5, 6] 3. The defendants, however, contend that, even if Cole held the way adversely and under a claim of right, he did not hold it at any time for a period of five successive years, and point out that, according to his own testimony, during part of the time that he was owner and in occupation of the dominant tenement he was also, for a season, a tenant of the Toogood property. It is to be conceded that one cannot acquire a prescriptive right over another's land while a tenant thereof, and that such a tenancy operates to stop the running of the statute if it has already commenced. Franz v. Mendonca, supra; Ball v. Kehl, 95 Cal. 606, 30 Pac. 780. The evidence, however, does not disclose at what period this merger occurred. Assuming it to be in the middle of the eight years when Cole was in personal occupation of the dominant tenement, the period most favorable to the contention of the defendants, there would still remain three or four years during the personal occupation and use of the right of way by Cole, to which must be added the years following when the land continued to be occupied by his tenants.

[7] 4. The defendants also point out that at various times both the defendants, Hanes and Toogood, were tenants of the dominant tenement, and that, not only did they not claim any right of way over the servient tenement during such tenancy, but that, as they have since become the owners of the servient tenement, such claims, even if made, would now be of no avail to the claimants. But we do not understand the law to be that the owner of the servient tenement can interrupt the continuous running of the statute by temporarily becoming a tenant of the dominant tenement. Moreover, the evidence is uncertain as to the time the defendants became tenants of the claimants' land. If it was since they became the owners of their respective lands, which was in both instances during the year 1907, the statute had already run in favor of the claimants, and, if before 1907, their subsequent purchase of the servient tenement would not undo the adverse right to the way already acquired by the grantors of the claimants.

[8] 5. Assuming that the right of way, as established by the court, extends wholly or in part over the Hanes property, it need only be said, in answer to the contentions of the defendants, that the evidence fully warrants the conclusion that, in such a case, the claimants have acquired a right of way by prescription as against defendant Hanes. As already stated, about the year 1890, Cole, who was then using the northern half of the 24-foot right of way described in the complaint, commenced using the southern half thereof, which portion was supposed to lie upon the lands now possessed by defendant Hanes. The defendants do not claim that Hanes or any of his predecessors in interest ever granted permission to the claimants or their predecessors to travel over the said southern 12 feet. It is suggested, however, that Hanes and his predecessors in interest had mistakenly presumed the said southern 12 feet to lie upon their neighbors' land to the north, and for that reason had made no protest against the trespassing of the various parties in possession of the claimants' land. But there is no force to this argument. "An owner of premises is presumed to know the true location of his boundaries, and is bound to take notice of the nature and extent of possession by a claimant." 2 C. J. 268, § 597½.

We think therefore that the finding of the court, "that for a period of more than 20 years last past the said strip has been used by the plaintiffs and their grantors and predecessors in interest under a claim of right, continuously, uninterruptedly, adversely, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owners and occupants of the * * * (here follows a description of the lands now occupied by defendants, Hanes and Toogood, respectively)," is properly sustained by the evidence.

[9] 6. The defendants call attention to the fact that the way to the west was not mentioned in any of the various mesne conveyances through which the claimants trace their title, while in each instance the deed describes the road to the north as the way appurtenant and incident to the land. It is contended therefore that the claimants cannot take advantage of the right of way gained by their predecessors. But the rule is well established in this state that an easement as a right of way is incident to the land and passes with it unless expressly excepted by the terms of the deed. Civ. Code, §§ 1084, 1104; Rubio Cañon, etc., Ass'n v. Everett, 154 Cal. 29, 33, 96 Pac. 811. See, also, Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 62, 66, 11 Pac. 879; 14 Cyc. 1152.

[10] 7. In the amended complaint it is alleged:

"That the plaintiffs herein are husband and wife, and that the property hereinafter described and alleged to be the property of the plaintiffs is community property, but that the record title is in the name of the wife, Theda R. Conaway."

The defendants demurred to the complaint upon the ground, among others:

"That there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff in said action, in that Theda R. Conaway is not a proper party plaintiff in said action."

In support of the demurrer, the defendants rely upon the rule that the husband has the management and control of the community property, retains the legal title notwithstanding it may stand of record in the name of the wife, and is the proper party in all actions concerning the community property. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170; Osborn v. Mills, 20 Cal. App. 346, 128 Pac. 1009; Feiser v. Griffin, 125 Cal. 9, 57 Pac. 690; Fulkerson v. Stiles, 156 Cal. 703, 105 Pac. 966, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 181; Barrie v. Carolan (C. C.) 111 Fed. 134; Civil Code, § 172; 21 Cyc. 1683. They contend, therefore, that it is error for the husband to join the wife with him in bringing the action. But as no damages were awarded to the claimants, and as the judgment was apparently not affected by the joinder of the wife as a party plaintiff, we cannot say that the defendants have suffered any injury by the ruling of the court upon the demurrer, even conceding that the ruling was erroneous. Hopper v. Barnes, 113 Cal. 636, 641, 45 Pac. 874; Meier v. Wagner, 27 Cal. App. 579, 150 Pac. 797; Bollinger v. Bollinger, 154 Cal. 695, 707, 99 Pac. 196. As was said in the Bollinger Case: "Judgment should not be reversed for errors that do not affect the substantial rights of the parties."

[11] 8. We find no merit in the claims of error in regard to the testimony of one Hansler, a co-owner of the property now owned by Toogood at the time Bentley commenced using the right of way to the west, as to the nature and character of such use. Even conceding that the testimony had the import claimed by the defendants, the error is not prejudicial, for the reason that we think that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the court in determining that a prescriptive right had subsequently ripened in Cole, independent of the legal effect of Bentley's use.

None of the other points merit discussion. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 683(1) — RIGHT OF WAY IN STREET—REQUISITES OF GRANT.

Municipal Corporation Act (Gen. Laws 1910, Act 2348) § 861, providing that resolutions granting franchises or for the payment of money must receive the votes of at least three city trustees, is qualified, as to ordinary railroad franchise, by Civ. Code, § 470, which requires a two-thirds vote of the trustees.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 683(1) — RIGHT OF WAY IN STREET — VALIDITY OF GRANT.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 465, 470, and Municipal Corporation Act, § 861, construed together, a resolution of the trustees of a sixth-class city granting a railroad company the right to lay a side track and turnouts in the city streets is void when passed the day of its introduction.

5. RAILROADS — 75(3)—RIGHT OF WAY IN HIGHWAY — CONSENT BY MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 465, 470, and Municipal Corporation Act, § 861, construed together, a railroad company obtained no right to lay a turnout in a sixth-class city street when the city trustees, upon permission being requested, referred the matter to themselves as a committee, but proceeded no further.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 683(1) — RIGHT OF WAY IN STREET—CONSENT BY MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 465, 470, and Municipal Corporation Act, § 861, construed together, a railroad company obtained no right to lay a turnout in a sixth-class city street because the city trustees told the company's engineer (but not at any regular meeting) that he could build such turnout.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 465, 470, and Municipal Corporation Act, § 861, construed together, a railroad company obtained no right to lay a side-track in a sixth-class city street when the city trustees upon permission being requested, referred the matter to a committee, which reported favorably, but proceeded no further.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 185; Dec. Dig. — 75(3).]

8. RAILROADS — 76—RIGHT OF WAY IN HIGHWAY—EXTENT OF RIGHT.

Civ. Code, § 465, subd. 5, granting railroad companies power to build railroads along any street, does not authorize the building of turnouts or side tracks in such streets.

9. RAILROADS — 75(3) — RIGHT OF WAY IN HIGHWAY—DURATION OF RIGHT.

A railroad running through the streets of a sixth-class city which disincorporated, but soon reincorporated, constructed certain turnouts and a side track in the streets after the reincorporation. Held such reincorporated period conferred no vested rights on the railroad to lay such tracks without obtaining the permission necessary under Civ. Code, § 470, for tracklaying in incorporated cities.

10. ESTOPPEL — 55—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—ESSENTIALS.

The court below correctly held there was no estoppel if it believed that plaintiff railroad company laid its tracks in the city streets without relying upon the legality of certain franchise proceedings which plaintiff now claims authorized such tracklaying.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 136–141; Dec. Dig. — 55.]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR — 931(3)—FINDING OF COURT—INFERENCES FROM PROVED FACTS.

12. ESTOPPEL ⚡58—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—ESSENTIALS.

Where a city is not estopped to claim plaintiff railroad company laid certain tracks in its streets without authority, no estoppel arises from plaintiff's subsequent use of such tracks in the absence of a showing that such user, or plaintiff's belief that it could lawfully use such tracks, had injured plaintiff.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company against the City of Long Beach and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Pennel Cherrington and Wilfred M. Peck, both of Los Angeles (A. S. Halsted, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Stephen G. Long, of Long Beach, and Geo. L. Hoodenpyl, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The object of the action was to enjoin the city of Long Beach and its officers from taking up and removing certain railroad sidings, and turnouts laid in the streets of the city and used by the plaintiff. The court below, upon the evidence, concluded that the plaintiff had no right to continue the use of said tracks or to maintain the same in the streets, and thereupon gave judgment for the defendants. At the time these sidings and turnouts were constructed, and for many years prior thereto, the plaintiff and its predecessors in interest had operated a single-track railway along the street in question, extending from the bay of San Pedro through Long Beach to the city of Los Angeles. This road was laid along the streets of Long Beach under grants from that city of two franchises to do so made on April 4 and April 18, 1891, respectively, to the plaintiff's predecessor. The grants are substantially alike in all respects. Some time prior to September, 1902, the plaintiff acquired the said franchises and the said railroad, and has ever since that time been operating the same. There are four separate sidings and turnouts involved in the action, to wit: (1) A sidetrack on Alamitos avenue extending from First to Second street; (2) two turnouts on Alamitos avenue for spur tracks to the freight depot, one near First street, the other near Fourth street; (3) a turnout near Third street extending to the grounds of the Ornamental Brick & Stone Company; (4) a siding extending from Seventh to Tenth street. The court below found that all of these sidings and turnouts were constructed and maintained without any authority from the said city. We are satisfied that its conclusion was correct.

[1-3] 1. The tracks embraced in the first and second descriptions aforesaid were built upon the supposed authority of certain proceedings of the board of trustees of said city in September, 1902. Long Beach was at that time a city of the sixth class, having five trustees. On September 2, 1902, a resolution was introduced at a meeting of the board purporting to grant to the plaintiff authority to construct these sidings and turnouts. Only four trustees were present. The resolution was put to vote at the same meeting and adopted by a vote of three to one. The authority of the board to grant such franchises is found in sections 465 and 470 of the Civil Code and in section 861 of the Municipal Corporation Act (Gen. Laws 1910, Act 2348), relating to cities of the sixth class. Subdivision 4 of section 465 purports to grant to every railroad corporation the power to lay out, construct, and maintain its road with one or more tracks and with such appendages and adjuncts as may be necessary for the convenient use of the same. This provision relates to the general power of the road to lay and maintain its road anywhere in the state "in such places as it may lawfully acquire and occupy for the purpose." It does not grant or confer rights of way for that purpose. Los Angeles v. S. P. Co., 157 Cal. 369, 108 Pac. 65. Subdivision 5 of this section authorizes such railroads to construct their roads along any street within the state. This section, however, is qualified and limited by the provisions of section 470, which reads as follows:

"No railroad corporation must use any street, alley, or highway, or any of the land or water, within any incorporated city or town, unless the right to so use the same is granted by a two-third[s] vote of the town or city authority from which the right must emanate."

Under this section the right to use any street within an incorporated city cannot exist unless it is granted by the proper city authority by a two-thirds vote. Section 861 of the Municipal Corporation Act prescribes the method of granting such franchises as follows:

"No ordinance, and no resolution granting any franchise for any purpose, shall be passed by the board of trustees on the day of its introduction, nor within five days thereafter nor at any other than a regular meeting. No resolution or order for the payment of money shall be passed at any other time than at a regular meeting. And no such ordinance, resolution, or order shall have any validity or effect unless passed by the votes of at least three trustees."

This section must, of course, be construed in connection with section 470 of the Civil Code. Its language, so far as it permits such ordinances to be passed by three trustees, is therefore qualified, so far as franchises for ordinary railroads are concerned, by the terms of section 470 which requires a two-thirds majority of the trustees.

[4] It will be seen from these provisions that the purported franchise under which these tracks were laid is void. Under section 861, it could not have been lawfully passed on the day of its introduction or within five days thereafter. The action taken upon it immediately upon its introduction was without authority of law, and therefore, under the familiar rule that the powers of cities are those only which are given by the charter, in this case the provisions of the Municipal Corporation Act (Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am. Dec. 96; Von Schmidt v. Widher, 105 Cal. 157, 38 Pac. 682; Hyatt v. Williams, 148 Cal. 585, 84 Pac. 41), the attempted passage of the ordinance was void by virtue of the requirements of said section 861. It is therefore unnecessary to decide whether or not, under section 470, in order to make a two-thirds majority of the board, four votes would be required.

Appellant's contention that this resolution was taken up at a subsequent meeting and adopted by the unanimous vote of the board cannot be sustained. The court found to the contrary, and the evidence sustains the finding. The matter taken up at the subsequent meeting was an entirely different resolution which by a clerical error was given the same number as that relating to this turnout. In fact, it did not relate to the same matter, and the resolution in question was never adopted except on its first introduction.

[5] 2. The right to maintain the third and fourth tracks above described is claimed under proceedings of the board of trustees on August 15, 1904. With respect to the third track it appears that the president of the Ornamental Brick & Stone Company on that day applied for permission to construct the turnout in question. Thereupon, on motion of the board, the "matter was referred to the board as committee of the whole with power to act." Nothing further was ever done by the council with respect to this application. From what has been said with respect to the first and second tracks in question it is plain that the railroad company by this action obtained no right whatever to lay or to maintain this turnout.

[6] It appears from the evidence that after this action of the board, referring the matter to the board as a committee of the whole, the members of the board went upon the ground with the plaintiff's engineer, and that at that place, and afterwards at the city hall, but not at any regular meeting, the engineer was informed that he could go ahead and build the turnout for the plaintiff. In pursuance of the permission thus given the turnout was constructed. In view of the statutory provisions above quoted, it is clear that this proceeding conferred no authority whatever upon the company to build and maintain the track.

mentioned, it appears that on August 1, 1904, the plaintiff asked of the board permission to construct the same, and the application was referred to the committee on public works. This committee on August 15th made its report to the board approving the application and recommending that it be granted. No further action was taken, and it does not appear that any franchise was granted or that council voted upon the report. Upon the principles we have already stated we must hold that this proceeding gave no authority for the construction and maintenance of this track.

[8, 9] 3. It appears that the city of Long Beach was first incorporated as a city of the sixth class in 1888. On August 26, 1897, by proceedings under the Municipal Corporation Act, it was disincorporated. It remained an unincorporated community until December 14, 1897, when it was again regularly incorporated as a city of the sixth class. At that time section 465 of the Civil Code gave to every railroad corporation the power to lay out its road and to construct and maintain the same "with a single or double track, and with such appendages and adjuncts as may be necessary for the convenient use of the same," and to construct such road along any street. Subdivisions 4 and 5. The appellant claims that by virtue of these subdivisions it acquired a franchise, not only to construct and maintain the single track already in operation, but at any time thereafter, and under any circumstance, to add such turnouts and sidings as should be found necessary for its convenient use; that this was a vested right of which it could not be deprived by the subsequent incorporation of the city. We cannot see any force whatever in this contention. Subdivision 4 merely gives the railroad power to construct and maintain a railroad. Los Angeles v. S. P. Co., supra. It does not purport to grant franchises. Subdivision 5 authorizes the construction of railroads along any street, but it does not authorize turnouts or sidings in a street or elsewhere. It must be construed in connection with section 470, which denies the right to use the street in a city except when granted by the board of trustees. The statute does not give to every railroad company in the state a vested interest of this character in every street, and in all other places of the kinds described, everywhere in the state, in advance. It merely constitutes an offer on the part of the state of such right—an offer which requires acceptance by use to make it complete. Until such acceptance no right vests under it. Stockton Gas, etc., Co. v. San Joaquin Co., 148 Cal. 318, 83 Pac. 54, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, 7 Ann. Cas. 511. During this interval the company made no turnouts or sidings in this street, and hence the standing offer remained in abeyance and no right to lay or maintain them was acquired. The grant by the city in 1891 included only the right to a single track in said street. Appellant's predecessor accepted this franchise, and it must be deemed to have thereby consented that its right in the street should be limited to a single track. The subsequent disincorporation of the city cannot in any respect extend or broaden this franchise or add to it the right to maintain sidings and turnouts. When the city was again incorporated, no additional tracks had been constructed, and the provisions of section 470 again controlled the situation and denied to the railroad company the power further to use the streets except by grant from the board of trustees.

[10, 11] 4. The appellant claims an estoppel against the city, and in support thereof makes in its brief a number of statements of fact tending to show that, in reliance upon the supposed validity of the permits and resolutions under which the tracks and turnouts in question were constructed, the appellant has expended large sums of money in the construction of tracks, depot buildings, and in the purchase of land, and that the city authorities for eight years, with full knowledge of the facts, acquiesced in the use of the streets by the appellant and made no objections thereto.

The officers and agents of the plaintiff, when they laid the tracks and expended the money, as claimed, knew that the vote upon the resolution of September 2, 1902, was taken on the day it was introduced, and not afterward, that only three members of the board of trustees voted for it, and that only four members were present. As to the other siding and turnout, they knew that there never was any resolution or ordinance passed purporting to allow the construction thereof. There was no direct evidence that they ever believed that any of the franchises or permits was lawfully given, or that they relied on such belief, or on the validity of the permits or franchises in constructing the tracks. The court below may have believed from the evidence that the tracks were not laid, the land purchased, or the money expended in reliance upon the supposed legality of the franchises claimed therefor, but that what the plaintiff's officers and agents really relied on was the favor, indulgence, neglect, or apathy of the city officials and the community. It was at liberty to draw against the plaintiff every reasonable inference arising from the evidence or from the want of evidence. In support of its decision we must presume that it did make these inferences, and concluded that no estoppel existed. If it did so, its conclusion was correct. Gardella v. Amador County, 164 Cal. 555, 564, 129 Pac. 993.

[12] If no estoppel against the city arose from the facts concerning the construction of these tracks, it is certain that none could arise merely from their subsequent use and operation by the plaintiff, no matter how long continued, in the absence of any showing that plaintiff suffered any hardship or detriment on account thereof, or on account of its belief that it had the lawful right to maintain and operate them.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

An irrigation district organized under St. 1887, p. 29, and authorized to issue its bonds by the sale thereof for cash at 90 cents on the dollar or in exchange for property at par, which issued bonds in form negotiable, as required by section 15, and, as required by the act, reciting that they were part of a series issued pursuant to and after a full compliance with the act, was estopped by such recital from pleading nonperformance of the statutory requirement as a defense to such bonds in the hands of a bona fide holder.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by A. M. Ham against the Grape-land Irrigation District. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leonard & Surr, of San Bernardino, for appellant. C. C. Haskell, Byron Waters, J. W. Curtis, and Curtis & McNabb, all of San Bernardino, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. Appellant, an irrigation district, issued certain bonds, to recover judgment upon part of which issue this action was brought.

In its answer defendant admitted the issuance of the bonds, but averred that they were unlawfully issued in that they were erroneously dated; that there was no value or lawful consideration paid therefor; that recovery thereon was barred by the statute of limitations; and that instead of being sold for cash they were, contrary to the provisions of the act authorizing their issue, exchanged for labor, commodities, and supplies.

The bonds and coupons described in the complaint, the due execution of which by the officers of the district in the form required by the act and their authority so to do is not questioned, together with accrued interest thereon amounted to the sum of $15,098.30. The court found that plaintiff was the legal holder of all the bonds; that a portion thereof, evidenced by coupons which had matured more than four years prior to the filing of the complaint, was barred by subdivision 1 of section 337, Code of Civil Procedure; and that certain of the bonds were acquired by plaintiff in payment for groceries and supplies sold defendant, by reason whereof plaintiff was not entitled to recover thereon. Excluding the bonds as to which it was held no recovery could be had, left remaining bonds, coupons, and accrued interest amounting to the sum of $4,444, for which judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and from which defendant prosecutes this appeal upon a bill of exceptions.

At all the times in question defendant was an irrigation district organized and existing under an act of the Legislature of the state of California entitled "An act to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts, and to provide for the acquisition of water and other property, and for the distribution of water thereby for irrigation purposes," approved March 7, 1887. Stats. 1887, p. 29. In the exercise of power conferred by said act, defendant authorized its officers to issue bonds in the sum of $200,000, of which the bonds in question are part thereof. The bonds upon which the judgment is based are all negotiable in form, dated January 1, 1891, and on their face recite that they were "issued by authority of, pursuant to, and after a full compliance with all the requirements of the act of the Legislature of the state of California, entitled 'An act to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts, and to provide for the acquisition of water and other property, and for the distribution of water thereby for irrigation purposes,' approved March 7, 1887, and the acts amendatory and supplementary thereto," all as provided in section 15 of the act. They may be divided into three classes designated as follows: First. The Bradshaw bond, numbered 1, for $500, sold and delivered on March 1, 1892, claimed to have been acquired thereafter by plaintiff in the ordinary course of business for a valuable consideration and without notice of any want of consideration paid therefor. Second. The Curtis bonds, being ten in number, each for the sum of $100, which bonds were transferred to plaintiff for collection and which it is claimed, were for a valuable consideration, acquired by Curtis, before maturity and without notice of alleged defects or want of consideration and from holders thereof other than defendant. Third. The remainder of the bonds included in the judgment may be designated as the Ham bonds, being those found by the court to have been acquired from parties other than defendant by plaintiff in the ordinary course of business, for a valuable consideration and without any notice of the facts upon which appellant insists they are void.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that, since the bonds provided that the installments of principal were payable only upon the surrender of coupons evidencing such principal, and the interest coupons provided for their payment at the office of the treasurer upon surrender thereof, the facts of presentation, offer to surrender and demand should have been alleged and proved in order to entitle plaintiff to judgment. Section 3130, Civil Code, provides that if the negotiable instrument "is by its terms payable at a specified place," and the maker thereof "is able and willing to pay it there at maturity, such ability and willingness are equivalent to an offer of payment upon his part." And section 3137, Civil Code, declares that as a condition concurrent to the payment of a negotiable instrument, the maker thereof may require "that the instrument be surrendered to him, unless it is lost or destroyed, or the holder has other claims upon it." If defendant was ready, able, and willing to pay the bonds upon presentment and surrender thereof at the place designated, such fact should have been pleaded by way of defense (Irvine v. Withers, 1 Stew. [Ala.] 234); not to the recovery upon the bond, however, but in defense of any obligation to pay costs, interest, or damage for delay in payment. As stated by Justice Field in a very early case:

"The undertaking of the parties, and the legal effect of such contracts is this: That if ready at the time and place with the funds, the obligor has so far satisfied the contract that he cannot be responsible for any future damages, either as costs of suit or interest for delay; not that he is thereby discharged of the debt." Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 307.

No claim is made that defendant was ready, able, and willing to pay the bonds and coupons had they been presented and an offer made to surrender them; indeed, it appears that to have done so would have been a futile act.

[2] Appellant's chief contention is that the bonds, contrary to the provisions of the act, were originally sold and delivered to purchasers thereof from whom plaintiff, with notice that they were disposed of in violation of law, acquired them, and even though acquired without notice prior to maturity and for value in the ordinary course of business, the bonds were nevertheless, by reason of the violation of the provisions of the act by the officers of the district in the sale and issue thereof, void in his hands.

All of the bonds involved in the suit, other than the Bradshaw bond No. 1, were part of a purported issue and sale of $150,000 in bonds, made by the officers of the district to one J. W. Mattern in the manner following: The bonds were duly advertised for sale, and it appearing there would be no bids for them, an understanding was had with Mattern whereby it was agreed that he should make a bid therefor of 90 cents on the dollar, which the board should and did accept; it being understood and agreed that Mattern, however, should assume no obligation to take or pay for the bonds so pretended to be purchased by him, and the officers of the district were to retain possession thereof, and as they were, if at all, in fact sold and disposed of deliver them to the real purchaser in the name of and under the pretense that they belonged to Mattern. Under the provisions of the act the bonds, other than in exchange for property at par, could not be disposed of, except by sale for cash at 90 cents on the dollar. Unable to secure purchasers of the bonds, and the board of directors being desirous of constructing its irrigating system and developing water therefor, and having no money on hand wherewith to do the work, they, as a part of the scheme, adopted the further plan of purchasing material, goods, and supplies and procuring labor to be performed, ostensibly for cash, but in fact for bonds, by agreeing with plaintiff and his firm that they would buy groceries and supplies from him, and at the end of the month, upon rendering his statement therefor, he should give his check for bonds at 90 cents on the dollar, and upon presenting the same, together with his monthly bill, they would deliver to him bonds in the amount of his check so received and return the check to him, it being understood that the check should not be cashed. One J. L. Adams, who at the time the arrangement was made was a director of the district and thereafter superintendent of construction, acted as the agent of plaintiff in the transaction had with the district, wherein and through such agency plaintiff acquired a part of the bonds. As to the bonds so purchased by plaintiff with groceries through Adams, the court rendered judgment for defendant. A like arrangement was made with various parties who furnished labor and material for the district in the construction of its canals, conduits, and pipe lines, pursuant to which they likewise gave their checks for the purchase of bonds to the extent of the work performed and materials furnished by them, for which bonds were issued and accepted at 90 cents on the dollar in payment of the bills rendered. The checks, pursuant to agreement, were not presented for payment nor paid, but merely used as the means of a purported compliance with the law, after which they were returned to the drawers thereof. The bonds and coupons upon which the judgment in favor of plaintiff was based were bonds so issued by defendant to other persons than plaintiff. That they were void in the hands of such purchasers and in the hands of subsequent owners thereof having notice of their infirmity is not questioned. Hughson v. Crane, 115 Cal. 415, 47 Pac. 120; Stimson v. Alessandro Irrigation Dist., 135 Cal. 389, 67 Pac. 496, 1034; Leeman v. Perris Irrigation Dist., 140 Cal. 540, 74 Pac. 24.

[3, 4] As to these bonds, however, the court found they were purchased by plaintiff, and by Curtis to whose rights the former succeeded, before maturity for value and in the ordinary course of business and without notice of the fact that they had been issued in the manner stated. These findings are attacked upon the ground that they are not supported by the evidence. As to the Curtis bonds of the face value of $1,000, it appears that plaintiff acquired them shortly prior to the commencement of the suit upon an agreement to pay Curtis 75 per cent. of what might be realized thereon, thus making his possession that of a holder for collection. The question therefore presented is whether Curtis, as transferor, was a bona fide holder, since if he was, his title and right to enforce payment could not be impaired by restrictions placed upon his power of disposal. Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51, 24 L. Ed. 681; Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 803. In Gunnison County Commissioners v. Rollins, 173 U. S. 255, 19 Sup. Ct. 390, 43 L. Ed. 689, it is said:

"A bona fide holder of commercial paper is entitled to transfer to a third party all the rights with which he is vested, and the title so acquired by his indorsee cannot be affected by proof that the indorsee was acquainted with defenses existing against the paper."

The evidence of Mr. Curtis clearly and strongly tends to prove that in the ordinary course of business he bought the bonds for a valuable consideration, paying cash therefor, and without any notice of the manner in which the district had disposed of them or the consideration paid to it by the parties from whom he purchased. Even conceding that evidence was introduced or circumstances shown tending to contradict his statement, nevertheless it would, at most, present a question as to which there was a conflict of evidence, and the finding of the court, that Curtis at the time when he transferred the bonds to plaintiff was a bona fide holder thereof for value, must be sustained.

[5] The finding of the court "that subsequently to the issuance of said bonds, and each of them, the plaintiff did in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, and for value, without any knowledge either actual or constructive of what the said Grapeland Irrigation District had received for said bonds, and before the apparent maturity of either said bonds or coupons, and without any knowledge of their actual dishonor, purchase each of said bonds and coupons alleged in plaintiff's complaint to be owned and held by him, except such notice as said plaintiff may have received from said district through the sale of groceries through one J. L. Adams, and except as hereinbefore found with reference to the bonds purchased of J. W. Curtis," paying therefor a valuable consideration, is based almost entirely upon testimony given by Mr. Ham. As to the bonds received by him through Adams as his agent in exchange for groceries and supplies furnished the district, the court found that he was not without notice that they were issued to him contrary to law. Conceding that, in the absence of other evidence tending to charge him with notice of the illegal issue, the knowledge of Adams while acting as his agent should, as held by the court, be imputed to him as to the bonds so bought through Adams, nevertheless the latter had nothing to do with the purchase of the bonds involved in the judgment. "As against a principal, both principal and agent are deemed to have notice of whatever either has notice of, and ought, in good faith and the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, to communicate to the other." Section 2332, Civ. Code. While Adams had full knowledge of the unlawful scheme adopted by the district in disposing of the bonds, no duty devolved upon him, within the scope of his authority, to acquaint plaintiff with the facts thereof, other than as such facts affected the bonds involved in the transaction in connection with which he represented plaintiff. He was in no wise connected with the purchase of any bonds upon which the judgment is based.

[6] Conceding, as claimed by appellant, that by reason of the fact that the bonds were sold for an illegal consideration, the burden of proof devolved upon plaintiff to show that he was without notice of such infirmity. Union Collection Co. v. Buckman, 150 Cal. 159, 88 Pac. 708, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 568, 119 Am. St. Rep. 164, 11 Ann. Cas. 609; Graham v. Larimer, 83 Cal. 173, 23 Pac. 286; Shain v. Goodwin (C. C.) 46 Fed. 564. It cannot be said the finding is wanting in sufficient evidence to support it.

[7] The testimony of plaintiff touching the subject may be conflicting, but it was for the trial court to reconcile the apparent inconsistencies therein and determine the fact. Considered as a whole, plaintiff's testimony in effect tends to prove that as to the bonds in question he had no notice of the fact that they were illegally issued. That plaintiff bought them in the ordinary course of business from parties other than the district, paying therefor a valuable consideration, clearly appears.

[8] It appears that the Bradshaw bond was one of a block of $28,000 in bonds issued at par in payment of the purchase price of property. The district cannot invoke as a defense to this bond the alleged fact that it made a bad bargain in purchasing the property. "The want of consideration for the undertaking of a maker, acceptor, or indorser of a negotiable instrument does not exonerate him from liability thereon to an indorsee in good faith for a consideration." Section 3122, Civ. Code. There was nothing illegal in the consideration originally paid for this bond.

[9, 10] It is next strenuously insisted that, regardless of how plaintiff acquired the bonds, and conceding his acquisition to have been without notice of their infirmity, they are nevertheless void and unenforceable in his hands. This contention is based upon section 42 of the act which provides:

"The board of directors, or other officers of the district, shall have no power to incur any debt or liability whatever, either by issuing bonds, or otherwise, in excess of the express provisions of this act, and any debt or liability incurred in excess of such express provisions shall be and remain absolutely void."

In discussing this question appellant directs our attention to the fact that the act provides only two ways in which the district may issue bonds: One by sale thereof for cash at 90 cents on the dollar; the other, as in the case of the Bradshaw bond, in exchange for property at par. Our attention is also directed to the fact that the bonds were antedated, being dated January 1, 1891, and not actually sold and issued until some two or three years thereafter. As hereinbefore stated, all the bonds were in form negotiable, as required by section 15 of the act, and each bond recites, as required by said section, that it "is one of a series of bonds amounting in the aggregate to $200,000, caused to be issued by the board of directors of said Grapeland Irrigation District, and pursuant to a vote of the electors in said district at an election held for that purpose on the 15th day of November, 1890, * * * and issued by authority of, pursuant to, and after a full compliance with, all the requirements of the act of the Legislature of the state of California, entitled", etc. If appellant's position is correct, then no purpose is subserved by the express requirement that the bonds shall be negotiable in form; nor, if the district may as against bona fide holders of bonds be heard to deny the facts so certified, does the recital of compliance with the provisions of the act as required in issuing the bonds serve any purpose whatsoever. The authorities seem to be uniform in holding that where a municipality has the power, upon the performance of certain precedent conditions, to issue bonds, and its officers through whom it acts are charged with ascertaining and determining the facts which constitute such performance and certify on the face of the bonds to a compliance therewith, the municipality is estopped from pleading nonperformance as a defense to such bonds in the hands of a bona fide holder thereof. Thus, in San Antonio v. Mehaffy, 96 U. S. 312, 24 L. Ed. 816, it is said:

"If a municipality could, under any circumstances, issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder of them has a right to presume they were issued under the circumstances which give the authority. The municipality is estopped by the recital on the face of the securities, to deny their verity as against a bona fide purchaser."

And in Grattan Township v. Chilton, 97 Fed. 145, 38 C. C. A. 84, it is said:

"If, under any circumstances, the board would have had authority to issue them, and the bonds would have been valid, innocent purchasers had the right to presume that those circumstances existed when they were issued, and the township was estopped to deny their existence after such purchasers had bought them in reliance upon the certificate that they were issued in compliance with the statute."

To the same effect is Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 897; Gunnison County Com'rs v. E. H. Rollins & Sons, 173 U. S. 256, 19 Sup. Ct. 390, 43 L. Ed. 689; Town of Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 484, 23 L. Ed. 579; Baxter v. Vineland Irrigation Dist., 136 Cal. 185, 68 Pac. 601; Stanley County Com'rs v. Coler & Co., 190 U. S. 438, 23 Sup. Ct. 811, 47 L. Ed. 1126. If the recital of "full compliance with all the requirements of the act" be held for naught, then it must necessarily follow that, notwithstanding the negotiable form of the bonds and the fact that title thereto passed by mere delivery, no value would attach to them, since their validity would always be open to contest as to the truth of a fact that the most diligent inquiry might fail to disclose. To so hold would, in our opinion, not only lead to disastrous consequences never intended by the Legislature, but would render nugatory the provision that the bonds should be negotiable in form and also destroy the effect of the recitals required to be made therein. We may reconcile the apparent inconsistency of the section with other parts of the act and give full effect to the provision by applying the principle of estoppel, in view of which we must assume it was adopted by the Legislature. Defendant conferred upon its officers the power to issue the bonds which they were authorized to sell upon complying with certain statutory provisions. From the fact that the statute required a recital of such compliance to be made in the bonds by such officers, it follows that they were charged with the determination of the question, and it was not intended they should certify to a falsehood, but to facts which were true. Vested with this power to determine what constituted "full compliance" and having so certified upon the face of the bonds, the district will not be heard as against a bona fide holder of bonds without notice of the alleged irregularity in the sale thereof, to say that the facts thus solemnly recited and upon which he innocently parted with his money are false. The purpose of estoppel is to conclude the truth in order to prevent fraud and falsehood. It is "an admission or determination under circumstances of such solemnity that the law will not allow the fact so admitted or established to be afterwards drawn in question between the same parties or their privies." Sly v. Hunt, 159 Mass. 151, 34 N. E. 187, 21 L. R. A. 680, 38 Am. St. Rep. 403. While in fact the bonds upon which the judgment is based were originally issued to purchasers having notice of the fact that the sale thereof was void, as provided in section 42 of the act, nevertheless, since plaintiff was a bona fide holder thereof having no notice of the irregularity in disposing of them for other consideration than cash at 90 cents on the dollar, he was entitled to rely upon the representations by way of recitals made in the bonds by the proper officers of the district, that they had fully complied with the provisions of the statute, and since it would be a fraud upon him to allow the district to plead the truth as against such recitals, it must be held to be estopped from so doing.

The judgment is affirmed.

CORONADO BEACH CO. et al. v. PILLSBURY et al., State Industrial Accident Commission. (L. A. 4359.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT $\S$ 373—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION—COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT.

Where an employé who was peculiarly susceptible of being tickled was going down a flight of stairs with a filled bucket, and one of his associates punched him in the back with a newspaper, causing him to make a sudden movement and to fall, injuring one knee seriously, his injury was in the course of, but did not arise out of his employment within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 283) § 12a, providing that liability shall exist against an employer for any personal injury sustained by his employés by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. $\S$ 373.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT $\S$ 373—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT.

That the act of a fellow servant in tickling a servant who was peculiarly sensitive, causing him to fall and suffer injury, was but momentary and without malice, and not in excess of the usual intercourse between servants, does not affect the question whether the accident arose out of the employment.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT $\S$ 371—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION—"ARISES OUT OF."

An accident which "arises out of" the employment of the person injured, within the Workmen's Compensation Act, is one in which it is possible to trace the injury to the nature of the employé's work or to the risks to which the employer's business exposes him, and must result from a risk reasonably incident to the employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. $\S$ 371.]

In Bank. Application by the Coronado Beach Company and another for writ of review against A. J. Pillsbury and others, as members of and constituting the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California. Award of compensation annulled.

Gavin McNab and Oliver B. Wyman, both of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Certiorari to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding benefits to Harry Flint, an employé of petitioner Coronado Beach Company. The other petitioner, Frankfort General Insurance Company, is interested because it has issued a policy of insurance to Coronado Beach Company covering industrial accidents to the servants of that corporation.

The facts are briefly set forth in the following quotation from the opinion of the Industrial Accident Commission:

"On the 13th day of October, 1914, Harry Flint, an employé of the Coronado Beach Company, San Diego County, Cal., was injured by accident, and the manner of his injury was as follows: He was known by his associates to be peculiarly susceptible of being tickled, and as he was going down a flight of stairs with a filled bucket in his hand one of his associates, in passing by, punched him in the back with a newspaper, which caused applicant to make a sudden movement and to fall, injuring one knee quite seriously. He demanded compensation for his injury, which demand was refused on the ground that his injury did not arise out of the employment in which he was engaged at the time, but was the result of 'skylarking.'"

In the same opinion it was admitted that as a general rule compensation is not awarded when injury results from friendly bouts or scuffling where the participants leave their work for the purpose of the contest, but the commissioners sought to differentiate this from cases arising out of such mutual play. The opinion contains this language:

"It is inevitable that, where human beings are associated together, there will be a certain amount of departure from the work in hand, and certain thoughtless acts of employes, not at all evilly disposed, will result in injury. We think that, up to a certain standard, such risks may properly be regarded as risks of the occupation and a proper charge against the industry. In this case the injured man did not depart from his duties to engage in any scuffling with the person who punched him in the back with a newspaper. It was a mere passing pleasantry such as slapping an acquaintance on the shoulder with the hand and such an act as is probably incident in all employments where a number of employes are brought into contact. We think this incident distinguishable from intentional playing of practical jokes where some possibility of injury is present. It is only when such physical contact exceeds the limits of normal association of human beings that the act may be regarded as skylarking, and therefore outside of the course of employment."

[1] Petitioner contends that the Industrial Accident Commission was without power to make an award, for the reason that the accident did not arise out of the employment. Section 12a of the Compensation Act (Stats. 1913, p. 283), contains the following language:

"Liability for the compensation provided by this act, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever, shall, without regard to negligence, exist against an employer for any personal injury sustained by his employes by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment."

In the proceeding before the Accident Commission upon petition for a rehearing amended findings were filed. These contain the following language:

"That at the time of said accident the applicant was carrying a bucket of rubbish down said flight of stairs in the course of his employment, and was not in any way neglecting or departing from his duties or joining in any conversation, jostling, or scuffling with fellow employes, but was in all ways attending strictly to the duties of his employment; that while so descending the stairs a fellow employe in passing casually thrust a newspaper against the ribs of the said applicant with intent to tickle him, but without malice or ill will or intent to cause any harm; that the act of the fellow employe in thrusting said newspaper against the ribs of the applicant was but a momentary act in passing, and not in excess of usual intercourse customary between employes while at work, and was not of sufficient seriousness to amount to practical joking or horseplay; that serious injury was not reasonably to be anticipated from such act; but that by mischance the applicant lost his balance and slid face downward five steps to the foot of the stairs."

It will be noticed from a reading of the statute quoted above that the liability for compensation accrues only for accidents arising out of and in the course of the employment of the person injured. That Flint was in the course of his employment at the time there can be no doubt, but it is equally clear that the accident did not arise out of his employment.

[2] That the act of his fellow servant was but momentary and without malice, and not in excess of the usual intercourse between servants, makes no difference. Suppose the fellow employe had tripped him up, intentionally, but playfully; would any one contend that the employer was liable because his servants (perhaps entirely without his knowledge) had established a custom of tripping one another? We cannot see how this assault differed from any other. Flint was hyper-aesthetic in that he was peculiarly sensitive to tickling. This was known to his associates. His fellow servant, who tickled him as he was going down a stairway carrying a bucket in his hand, may have been an amiable person who merely intended a bit of rough play, but, unless he was an idiot, he must have seen that such a prank was attended with some danger. If his sense of proportion had been even more distorted, and he had pushed Flint down the stairs in the joyous hope of seeing the latter sprawl humorously on the floor below, no one would contend that the accident occurred in the course of the employment of the injured man. We cannot see that it is our duty to measure the dynamics of assaults and to hold that the master must be charged with foreseeing and insuring against those which are playfully intended and which may be sanctioned by a custom existing among his servants.

[3] The accidents arising out of the employment of the person injured are those in which it is possible to trace the injury to the nature of the employe's work or to the risks to which the employer's business exposes the employe. "The accident must be one resulting from a risk reasonably incident to the employment. Fitzgerald v. Clarke & Son, [1908] 2 K. B. 796; 77 L. J. K. B. 1018. It "arises out of" the occupation when there is a causal connection between the conditions under which the servant works and the resulting injury. It need not have been foreseen or expected, but after the event it must appear to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence. McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, 499, 102 N. E. 697, L. R. A. 1916A, 306. In the case last cited the court held that the employer was liable on the ground that the workman was killed by a fellow servant who was in "an intoxicated frenzy and passion," and who was "in the habit of drinking to intoxication, and when intoxicated was quarrelsome and dangerous, and unsafe to be permitted to work with his fellow employes, all of which was known to the superintendent, Matthews." It was held that a natural result of the employment of a peaceable workman with a quarrelsome drunkard would be an attack by the latter upon the former. But in the declaration of the rule applicable to cases in which the question to be determined is whether or not the injury arose out of the employment the court made an interesting and instructive review of some of the leading cases which will be of value to us in this discussion. Speaking of the rulings in England on the industrial accident statutes, the court said:

"It there had been held that injuries received from lightning on a high and unusually exposed scaffold, Andrew v. Fallsworth Industrial Society, [1904] 2 K. B. 32; from the bite of a cat habitually kept in the place of employment, Rowland v. Wright, [1909] 1 K. B. 963; from a stone thrown by a boy from the top of a bridge at a locomotive passing underneath, Challis v. London & Southwestern Railway, [1905] 2 K. B. 154; and from an attack upon a cashier traveling with a large sum of money, Nisbet v. Rayne & Burn, [1910] 2 K. B. 689—all arose in the course and out of the employment; while the contrary had been held as to injuries resulting from a piece of iron thrown in anger by a boy in the same service, Armitage v. Lancashire & Yorkshire Railway, [1902] 2 K. B. 178; from fright at the incursion of an insect into the room, Craske v. Wigan, [1909] 2 K. B. 635; and from a felonious assault of the employer, Blake v. Head, 106 L. T. Rep. 822."

Later in the opinion this language was used:

"A fall from a quay by a sailor while returning from shore leave, Kitchenham v. Owners of S. S. Johannesburg, [1911] 1 K. B. 523; s. c. [1911] A. C. 417; a sting from a wasp, Ayns v. Barton, [1912] 1 K. B. 40; and a frostbite, Warner v. Couchman, [1912] A. C. 35—all have been held to be injuries not 'arising out of' the employment."

These citations aptly illustrate the rule that those injuries only are compensable which result from risk reasonably incident to the employment.

The committee of arbitration of the Massachusetts Industrial Accident Board passed upon a matter involving almost identically the same state of facts as those here considered. We quote from the decision of the committee as follows:

"The committee finds that the employé was at work for his employer when another employé tickled him. He is very ticklish, and the act of the other employé was the cause of the injury. The employé himself was not at fault at all, and did not grapple with the other man or fool with him. But the committee finds that the accident did not arise out of the employment and the employé is not entitled to recover. The representative of the employé dissents." Clark v. Terry and London & Lancashire Guarantee & Accident Co., decided by the Massachusetts Industrial Accident Board February 10, 1915, and quoted in the opinion of the Industrial Accident Commission of California in the proceeding we are now considering.

The learned Industrial Accident Commission has held that a foreman injured by another employé who in anger struck him was not entitled to compensation, where it appeared that the assault was entirely unprovoked, and that it was not due to any previous altercation between the assailant and the person injured, or to any attempt on the part of the foreman to enforce any instructions or orders. Petersen v. Valley Pipe Line, vol. 2, p. 606, advance sheet No. 8, Industrial Accident Commission Decisions. It was held that the employment of the foreman "did not expose him to risk of such assault to any greater extent than the risk of any bystander not so employed of being assaulted in the same manner." This conclusion from the facts found was logical and proper. In the matter at bar the employment of Flint exposed him to no greater danger from being tickled by a fellow servant than would a guest in the hotel of his employer have been so exposed. The two cases are quite similar, except that Flint's assailant used less force and greater good humor in his unwarranted interference with his fellow servant than did the man who hit Petersen.

The Supreme Court of New Jersey took the same view as that adopted by the Industrial Accident Commission of California in a case somewhat similar to this. The accident arose out of a playful attempt on the part of a workman to strike or to knock off the hat of a coworker who was passing. The man dodged, slipped on the floor, and sustained injuries from which he died. It was held that the attack made upon decedent was not so disconnected from his employment as to take it out of the class of risks reasonably incident to the employment of labor. Hulley v. Moosbrugger, 87 N. J. Law, 103, 93 Atl. 79. On appeal the judgment was reversed by the Court of Errors and Appeals. Hulley v. Moosbrugger, 95 Atl. 1007. The opinion is by Chancellor Walker, who reviews and quotes at length from the English and other decisions. It was held immaterial whether or not Hulley took part in or instigated the "larking" which resulted in the accident. Among other things, the learned chancellor said:

"In the case at bar the employer was not charged with the duty to see to it that none of his employes assaulted any other one of them, either willfully or sportively. And when one made such an assault upon another he was guilty of the doing of a negligent act as an individual tort-feasor, for which his employer was not responsible. * * *

"We are of opinion that an employer is not liable, under the Workmen's Compensation Act * * * to make compensation for injury to an employé, which was the result of horseplay or skylarking, so called, whether the injured or deceased party instigated the occurrence or took no part in it; for, while an accident, happening in such circumstances may arise in the course of it, it cannot be said to arise out of the employment."

Counsel for the respondents cites the case of Challis v. London & Southwestern Railway, supra, as strongly supporting the views of the commission. In that case a locomotive engineer was hit by a stone thrown by a small boy. It was held that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment because it is a matter of common knowledge that trains in motion have a great attraction for mischievous boys as objects at which to discharge missiles. We need not discuss at length this doctrine which seems to be somewhat analogous to the rule in the "turntable cases," because it rests fundamentally upon the known tendencies of non-age, and not upon the custom of playful adults.

In Hillis v. Shaw, Workmen's Compensation Reports (1913), the facts disclosed an accidental shooting of a domestic servant by a farm laborer who pointed a gun at her probably in jest. It was held that the injury did not result from an accident arising out of the woman's employment.

In Wilson v. Laing, 46 S. L. R., 2 Butterworth's Cases, 118, the court was considering an appeal from an award at the sheriff court at Edinburgh. The appellant was a housemaid employed by respondent. A fellow servant, a nursemaid, playfully threw at the housemaid a toy india rubber air ball, striking her in the eye and inflicting serious injury. The sheriff was upheld in his refusal to award compensation. One sentence in the opinion of the lord justice clerk is worthy of particular attention. It is as follows:

"It is a very far-fetched idea that, because this happened in a house where there were children and children's toys, therefore the risk of accidents happening through a toy being thrown by one servant at another was one of the risks incident to the appellant's employment."

In Willis' Workmen's Compensation (1914) pp. 23 and 24, the learned author states the rule as follows:

"It is not within the scope of employment of workmen, whether boys or men, to indulge in horseplay, and injury thereby sustained by a workman, even though he is not a party to the larking, is not an injury by accident arising either in the course of or out of the employment"—citing Armitage v. Lancashire, etc., Ry. Co., 2 K. B. 178, 4 W. C. C. 5.

The most recent authority on this subject is Federal Rubber Co. v. Havolic (Wis.) 153 N. W. 143.

We are of the opinion that upon reason and upon the overwhelming weight of authority we must hold that the decision of the Industrial Accident Commission in the matter of the application of Flint was erroneous. The accident did not arise "out of" the employment, and the servant therefore is not entitled to recover compensation.

The award is annulled.

FISHERING v. PILLSBURY et al., State Industrial Accident Commission.
(S. F. 7587.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1916.)

MASTER AND SERVANT — 373 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

An employé the sight of whose eye was destroyed by a missile from a trick camera directed toward him by a fellow employé in sport is not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. St. 279.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. 373.]

In Bank. Application by F. E. Fishing for writ of review against A. J. Pillsbury and others, members of and constituting the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California. Dismissed.

T. H. Selvage, of Eureka, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents. Jas. Alva Watt and Rolla Bishop Watt, both of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

MELVIN, J. A writ of review was issued for the purpose of bringing before this court the proceedings of the Industrial Accident Commission upon the application of one F. E. Fishing for compensation. The commission denied the application (one of the commissioners dissenting).

The facts were as follows: Mr. Fishing was employed in the establishment of Daly Bros., dealers, among other things, in toys. One day a fellow employé took a "trick" camera into the petitioner's office, pointed it at him, told him to "look pleasant," and before he could protect himself touched a button which caused a spring to be ejected from the false camera. The missile struck Mr. Fishing so that as a result of the injury thereby inflicted he lost the sight of one eye. There was nothing malicious in the act of Mr. Whalen, the young man who sportively operated the camera.

Although one of the commissioners in his written opinion sought to distinguish the facts shown above from those appearing in the application of Flint for compensation from Coronado Beach Company and the Frankfort General Insurance Company, on the ground that one bit of "horseplay" was intentional and premeditated, while the other was the result of an act not transcending the bounds of ordinary social intercourse between fellow servants, we are unable to perceive any logical difference between the two cases, and therefore, upon the authority of Coronado Beach Company v. Pillsbury et al. (L. A. No. 4359) 153 Pac. 212, in which an opinion has this day (June 7, 1916) been filed, we approve the action of the Industrial Accident Commission.

In the briefs of counsel for the petitioner great stress is laid upon the fact that the fellow servant of said petitioner was only 17 years of age, and an attempt was made to show that this case comes properly within the rule announced in Challis v. London and Southwestern Ry. Co. [1905], 2 K. B. 154. That case (which involved an injury inflicted upon a locomotive engineer by a stone hurled by a small boy), was cited and discussed in the opinion in Coronado Beach Company v. Pillsbury et al. We need not comment upon it further, except to say that, even assuming the adoption by us of the extreme doctrine of that case, it has no logical application to the facts here reviewed. Mr. Whalen had been employed in Daly Bros.' establishment for some time, progressing from one position to another until at the time of the accident he occupied a place in the toy department. He was a young man apparently of at least normal capacity and intelligence (to judge from his testimony before the referee). It would be absurd to place him in the same category as the child of the Challis Case.

The proceeding is dismissed.

SCHMITT v. WHITE, Judge of Superior Court. (S. F. 7738.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 17, 1916.)

APPEAL AND ERROR 597(1)—TRANSCRIPT—TIME OF NOTICE — EFFECT OF CHANGE IN STATUTE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, provides that one desiring to appeal may, in lieu of settling a bill of exceptions, within ten days after notice of the judgment or order, file a notice of intent to appeal or of appeal therefrom, and request that a transcript be prepared. St. 1915, p. 206, adds a provision that, if a proceeding on motion for new trial be pending, such notice might be filed "within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or of other termination thereof." Held to enable appellant to include in his transcript on appeal the matters material to a review of the court's action on his motion for a new trial (right of appeal from an order determining a motion for new trial being abolished by section 963, as amended by St. 1915, p. 209, and right to review the order on appeal from the judgment being given by section 956, as amended by St. 1915, p. 328), and not to revive a right which had expired to a transcript for the appeal from the judgment proper, so that the notice of intent to move for a new trial having stated that the motion would be made on affidavits and a bill of exceptions, and the motion having been dismissed for delay in prosecuting it, the transcript of the proceedings of the trial would not be material in reviewing such determination, so that there was no right thereto.

In Bank. Original proceeding in mandate by George Schmitt against Hon. J. Q. White, Judge of the Superior Court of Mendocino County. Dismissed.

Preston & Preston, of Ukiah, and Lovett K. Fraser, all of San Francisco, for petitioner. Robert Duncan, of Ukiah, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an original proceeding in mandate to compel a trial judge to certify a transcript prepared under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, for use on petitioner's appeal from a judgment. An alternative writ of mandate was issued, and the matter has been submitted for decision upon respondent's demurrer to the petition.

The judgment was one entered January 15, 1915, in an action wherein petitioner was plaintiff and one Redemeyer defendant. It was a judgment given upon granting the defendant's motion for a nonsuit. Notice of entry of the judgment was given petitioner on January 15, 1915. On January 25, 1915, petitioner duly gave and filed notice of his intention to move for a new trial upon various grounds, specifying in his notice that as to two of the grounds the motion would be made upon affidavit, and that as to each of the other grounds it would be "made upon a bill of exceptions to be hereafter prepared and settled as provided by law." Thereafter, on March 9, 1915, he appealed from the judgment. On January 3, 1916, the judge, on the objection of the defendant, refused to settle the proposed bill of exceptions, and on the same day an order was made denying the motion of petitioner to be relieved from his neglect and delay in the matter of said bill and in pressing his motion for a new trial, and also dismissing the motion for a new trial and all proceedings thereon. It is not claimed that there was any error in the action of the judge in so far as his refusal to settle the bill was concerned, or in the order refusing to relieve petitioner from his default. Within ten days thereafter, on January 13, 1916, petitioner filed with the clerk of the court a notice for the preparation of a record under section 953a for use on his appeal from the judgment, the same to consist of a transcript of the "testimony offered or taken, evidence offered and received, and all rulings, acts, instructions, or statements of the court; also all objections or exceptions on motion made or taken in said action, and all matters to which the same relate." The notice further specified that the judgment roll be incorporated and petitioner's notice of intention to move for a new trial, the minute order of the court dismissing petitioner's motion for a new trial, all minute orders, and some other matters not material to any question involved here. No affidavits on motion for new trial were called for, and it does not appear that any such affidavit was ever filed. The transcript was prepared as required, certified by the clerk in so far as he had authority to certify, and duly presented to the judge for certification. The transcript prepared by the stenographic reporter was one of all the testimony taken and the proceedings had at the trial of said action. On February 5, 1916, on the objection of defendant that the time for such a transcript had expired long before the initiation of proceedings therefor, the judge refused to certify the transcript. It is not disputed that it is, in fact, a correct transcript of the proceedings.

As the law was at the date of entry of the judgment and up to August 8, 1915, a proceeding for a transcript under section 953a was required to be initiated by the filing of the notice with the clerk "within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment, order or decree" appealed or to be appealed from. Unless so initiated within said time, no such transcript could be obtained. Petitioner's right to such a transcript on his appeal from the judgment therefore expired January 25, 1915. On August 8, 1915, various amendments of our statutory provisions made at the legislative session of 1915 relative to practice took effect. Section 953a was amended by the addition of a provision to the effect that, if a proceeding on motion for new trial be pending, such notice might be filed "within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or of other termination thereof." As we have seen, there was pending a proceeding on motion for new trial at the time this change in the law became effective, and this proceeding was not terminated until January 3, 1916 (S. F. & Oakland T. Rys. v. Superior Court, S. F. No. 7795, 157 Pac. 604); so that, if this provision is applicable under the circumstances stated, petitioner's proceeding for a record initiated on January 13, 1916, was in time.

The sole object of the addition of this provision is obvious. By other amendments taking effect at the same time, constituting parts of a considerable change in our system of practice, the previously existing right of appeal from an order determining a motion for a new trial was abolished except in the single case of an order granting a new trial in an action tried by a jury where such trial by jury is a matter of right (section 963, Code Civ. Proc.), and it was provided that on an appeal from a judgment the appellate court might also review any order on motion for a new trial (section 956, Code Civ. Proc.), something that previously could not be done. It is thus apparent that, notwithstanding the abolition of such right of appeal, the Legislature desired to preserve a right of review of such an order by an appellate court, and did so by making the order reviewable on the appeal from the judgment. It is equally clear that the only object of the addition to section 953a of the provision we have referred to was to enable a party to include in his transcript prepared under that section for use on the appeal from the judgment the matters material to a review of the action of the court on his motion for a new trial and thus to enable the desired review to be had. Manifestly it was the desire of the Legislature that, notwithstanding the abolition of the right of appeal from an order denying a new trial, opportunity should be afforded to the parties in all cases to obtain a review of such an order, and the proviso should be liberally construed for the purpose of enabling such a review to be had where the proceeding on motion for a new trial was pending at the date the change in the law took effect.

But just as clearly it cannot fairly be held that it was intended to give a party who had appealed from a judgment prior to the change in the law, and whose right to such a record had absolutely expired prior to such date, a right to a new record for the purpose of reviewing matters in no way germane to the question of the correctness of the disposition by the trial court of the motion for new trial, and material only to questions involved in the appeal from the judgment as the law stood before the change of August 8th. To construe the law otherwise would be to give it a retroactive effect not warranted by any rule of construction. If the change had simply been to extend the time for making the demand from ten days to one year, this would perhaps more clearly appear, but there is no difference in principle as to the two conditions. It is uniformly held that a change in the law extending the time in which a proceeding may be commenced will not be considered as operating to create a new right as to one where the time under the old law had already expired; that is, at least, unless the intent to accomplish this is very clearly manifested.

At the time of the change in the law what was the situation with respect to these matters? Petitioner had absolutely lost by expiration of time his right to any record under section 953a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. His only possible record, in addition to the judgment roll, was the bill of exceptions, proceedings for the settlement of which, it may be assumed, were then pending. The right to this he subsequently lost purely by reason of his own default, and not on account of any change in the law. This fact, however, cannot affect the question of the right of appellant to a record under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. That right was no longer in existence at the date of the change in the law, but had expired many months before. The proceeding for a record under section 953a is an independent proceeding, an alternative method of preparing a record, in lieu of a bill of exceptions, to which a party may resort at his option. But it was essential that the party should inaugurate such proceedings within the time designated in the law. It cannot be held that by the change it was intended to give to a party whose right had expired prior thereto a new right to inaugurate such a proceeding.

As we have intimated, it may be that petitioner is entitled to a record under section 953a in so far as the same is material solely to the determination of the question of the correctness of the trial court's action on the motion for a new trial. But obviously such is not the record which it is here sought to require the judge to certify. The reporter's transcript of the proceedings at the trial, which the petition shows is the record desired to be so certified, could not be considered in reviewing the action of the court in disposing of the motion for new trial for at least two reasons shown by the allegations of the petition. In the first place, the notice of intention to move for a new trial specified, as the law then required it to specify, and as it still requires it to specify, how the motion would be made, and stated that it would be made, not upon the minutes of the court, but upon affidavits and a bill of exceptions. Notwithstanding the subsequent changes in the law, one of which was to require motions to be made only on affidavits in certain cases and the minutes of the court in other cases, it is clear that it cannot be held to have been intended to affect proceedings for a new trial pending at the time of the changes, and that such proceedings must be determined on the record specified in the notice of intention, provided, of course, such specified record was authorized by the law as it stood at the time of the filing of the notice of intention. Petitioner's motion for a new trial, in view of his notice, could not be made or determined on the minutes of the court. He was confined to affidavits and a bill of exceptions, and the reporter's transcript of the proceedings at the trial could play no part either in the determination of the motion in the court below, or on review of that determination by an appellate court. In the second place, the petition shows that the motion for a new trial was not determined on the merits, but was dismissed for neglect and delay in prosecuting it—a question in the determination of which the transcript of the proceedings of the trial would not be material. While the dismissal of the motion under such circumstances may be taken as a denial of the motion for the purpose of authorizing a review of the order by an appellate court, the question on review would be whether the trial court erred in dismissing the proceedings and refusing to consider it on its merits. The conclusion of the trial court necessarily involved the neglect and delay of petitioner in the matter of procuring settlement of a bill of exceptions, the only record (except affidavits, which, it does not appear, were ever filed) upon which the motion could be heard. The trial judge having refused to settle any such bill on account of petitioner's inexcusable default in the matter, and petitioner having been refused relief from such default, as to neither of which rulings is it suggested that there was any error, there apparently was no record upon which the motion for a new trial could be determined on its merits.

It is obvious that petitioner is really seeking a record for use on his appeal from the judgment proper in lieu of the bill of exceptions which he attempted to obtain and which he has lost by reason of his default. The demand made upon respondent was that he certify "to the said reporter's transcript, and add his certificate thereto that the same was a correct transcript of the evidence had and received and all other proceedings in the trial" of said cause. The prayer of the petitioner on this proceeding is for mandate requiring this to be done. This, under the circumstances, we are satisfied petitioner is not entitled to. The record which it is sought to require the judge to certify to is not, under the circumstances, such a record as the judge is required to certify, and therefore the application for a writ of mandate must be denied.

The alternative writ heretofore issued is discharged, and the proceeding dismissed.

A proceeding in review against the Industrial Accident Commission, brought under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1913, p. 318) $\S$ 84, should be against the Commission by its name, "Industrial Accident Commission" and not against the individuals composing it, while persons interested in maintaining the award sought to be annulled should be joined.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT $\S$ 397—INJURIES TO SERVANT—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT.

Under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, $\S$ 24, declaring that either party shall have the right to be present at any hearing in person or by attorney or by any other agent and to present such testimony as shall be pertinent under the pleadings, but the Commission may, with or without notice to either party, cause testimony to be taken or inspection of the premises where the injury occurred to be made, or the pay roll of the employer to be examined, and such testimony or the result of the inspection and examination reported to the Commission, the Commission cannot take testimony against one sought to be held liable before such person has received any notice of injured employé's application, for the Commission is a judicial body, and to hear such testimony without notice would violate the constitutional guaranty of due process of law, so any opposite construction should be avoided.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Application for writ of review by H. F. Carstens against A. J. Pillsbury and others, composing the Industrial Commission. Writ issued, and award of Commission against petitioner annulled and proceeding dismissed.

Driver & Driver, of Sacramento, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for defendants.

SHAW, J. [1] This is an original proceeding in review against the Industrial Accident Commission, under section 84 of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act. As these proceedings are of frequent occurrence, it is proper to say to those initiating them that the members of the Commission individually, are not proper parties defendant in such proceedings. The Commission, by its name, "Industrial Accident Commission," as given in section 3 of the act, is the proper defendant. The members cannot be made personally responsible for the acts of the Commission in the proceedings, at least, not in a proceeding for a review. The person or persons interested in maintaining the award should also be joined.

The Commission, on December 31, 1914, made an award in favor of Tony Silva against James Common, James W. Sturdivant, and H. F. Carstens, or either of them, requiring the payment to Silva of $74.71, as a temporary total disability indemnity, $131.18 as a temporary partial disability indemnity, and $9.37 per week from January 2, 1915, until the termination of the existing partial disability, all on account of accidental bodily injuries received by Silva while he was in the employ of James Common. Sturdivant and Carstens have each begun proceedings in this court to review said award. The present proceeding is the one begun by Carstens.

The injury occurred on August 11, 1914. On September 24, 1914, Silva made and filed his application to the Commission for compensation under the aforesaid act. In said application he named as defendants James Common and James W. Sturdivant. Notices of the filing of the application were issued by the Commission, the cause being entitled therein in the same manner as in the application itself. To each of these notices was attached a copy of the application. Service thereof was made upon Common and Sturdivant by delivering to each of them a copy of the notice and application. The application stated that on August 11, 1914, Silva was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by said "James Common, intermediate contractor," at a place described as "6th Ave., Oak Park, Sacramento Co. Cal." Under the heading "3, Name and Address of All Other Parties to This Application, and Reason Such Parties are Joined" there was the following: "Jas. W. Sturdivant, #130 Glenn Ave., Oak Park, Sacramento Co., Cal. (General Contractor)." A notice of hearing was also issued and served upon the aforesaid parties, stating that the same had been set for hearing on October 6, 1914. Carstens was not mentioned or referred to, either in the application or in the notices.

On October 6, 1914, Common and Sturdivant appeared at the hearing in person. Sturdivant was also represented by an attorney. Thereupon Tony Silva, James Common, Dr. Manuel Silva, and James W. Sturdivant were examined as witnesses. From their evidence it appeared that the applicant was injured while taking barrels out of a wagon; that a barrel fell upon him, hurt his back, and caused a rupture; that this happened while he was in the employment of Common at the time stated; that Sturdivant was building a house for Carstens; that he sublet a part of the contract to Common; that the accident happened while Common was engaged in some part of the work he was required to do by his subcontract; and that Carstens was the owner of the building which was being erected. It further appeared that the lot upon which the house was being erected was lot 87, H. J. addition, "F" on Sierra street, in Sacramento, Cal., and not on Sixth avenue, Oak Park. Upon eliciting the information that Carstens was the owner, and that Sturdivant was erecting a building for him, the Commission, on October 14, 1914, issued and served on Carstens another notice of the filing of the application of Silva, in which notice Tony Silva was named as the applicant and the following persons were named as defendants:

"James Common (intermediate contractor), Jas. W. Sturdivant (general contractor), and H. F. Carstens (owner)."

A copy of the original application was attached to the notice. Carstens also received, with the aforesaid notice, a notice stating that the application would be heard on October 21, 1914. It does not appear that Carstens owned any property at Sixth avenue, Oak Park, or that the accident occurred at that place. He did own the property at the place where the accident occurred, which was on Sierra street, as above stated. Carstens did not appear on October 21st, the time stated in the last-mentioned notice, and the hearing proceeded in his absence before a referee appointed by the Commission for that purpose. Silva testified about the number of days he had worked during the year and the effect of the injury upon him. Another hearing was held on December 15, 1914, before another referee, and without notice to any of the parties. None of them was present. The evidence introduced after the issuing of the notice to Carstens contained no statement or indication that Carstens was the owner of any building, or sustained any relation to Silva, Common, or Sturdivant, or any evidence whatever to sustain the award against him. The final hearing was held on December 30, 1914, at which it appears no persons were present except the members of the Commission.

[2] The first point urged by the petitioner is that the Industrial Accident Commission, in making an award of compensation under the said act, exercises judicial functions and is, to all intents and purposes, a court. This question is disposed of by the decision of this court in Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury (L. A. No. 4030) 156 Pac. 491, decided March 24, 1916. The opinion discusses the question exhaustively, and holds that the Industrial Accident Commission, in awarding compensation under the act, is a judicial body and exercises judicial functions. See, also, Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 153 Pac. 26.

[3, 4] The petitioner contends that the award was made without jurisdiction of the petitioner, and without due process of law upon him. From what has been said it appears that the application filed by Silva contained no statement of any claim or cause of action against Carstens. His name was not mentioned therein, nor was it stated that any person whatever was the owner of the property or liable as such to make compensation to the applicant for the injury complained of. The notice served upon Carstens had attached thereto the application, which informed him that no claim was made against him. For the purpose of this decision, however, we will assume, though we by no means decide, that the notice was sufficient to put him on inquiry, so that if he failed to attend at the time stated, it would be at the peril of being bound by any award made against him, if it were otherwise valid.

Objection is also made to the conduct of the Commission in considering evidence taken before he received any notice of the application. This objection is well taken. The evidence upon which the award was based, so far as it tends to disclose any connection of Carstens with the injury, was all taken before he was made a party and before the notice to him. Evidence so taken could not be lawfully considered as evidence against him. He had no notice of it; he was not present to contradict or explain it, and its force and effect is not binding upon him. Due process of law requires that the party against whom a claim is asserted shall have opportunity to be present when the evidence to sustain the claim is introduced. This privilege was not afforded to Carstens in this case. Section 24 of the act provides that:

"Either party shall have the right to be present at any hearing, in person or by attorney or by any other agent, and to present such testimony as shall be pertinent under the pleadings, but the Commission may, with or without notice to either party, cause testimony to be taken, or inspection of the premises where the injury occurred to be made, or the time books and pay roll of the employer to be examined, * * * the testimony so taken and the results of any such inspection or examination to be reported to the commission for its consideration."

The right to be present at any hearing necessarily includes the right to have notice of such hearing in time to attend. The suggestion that the succeeding passage gives power to the Commission to take evidence secretly, without notice to either party, and to consider it without even giving the parties an opportunity to read the report of it, or to meet it in any reasonable way, is contrary to all principles of justice and fairness. It cannot be entertained for a moment. Even if the language were capable of such an interpretation, it would be a clear violation of the right to due process of law to follow it. As will presently be seen, the Commission, upon such hearings, must find facts and declare and enforce rights and liabilities, in short, it acts as a court, and it must observe the mandate of the Constitution of the United States that this cannot be done except after due process of law. But we do not think the section, when given a reasonable interpretation, authorizes such star-chamber proceedings. It must be read as an entirety, and in the light of the rule that an unconstitutional effect should not be given to it if another meaning is reasonably discoverable from the language. The taking of testimony and the reception of evidence are essentially parts of a hearing. If the Commission directs it to be done without notice, the right to be present at the hearing will not be given unless, at least, before the trial or hearing is concluded, the report of such testimony and evidence, made to the Commission, is exhibited to each party and he is afforded an opportunity, if he so desires, to recall and cross-examine the witnesses and to rebut the evidence reported. The express language of the section is silent on this point, but the declared "right to be present at any hearing" and to "present such testimony as shall be pertinent under the pleadings" implies that this shall be done. From this it also follows that the findings, so far as Carstens is concerned, are not supported by any evidence which can be considered as against him. As all the evidence tending to show that Carstens was the owner of the lot, that Sturdivant had agreed to erect a building thereon for him, and that Common, the employer of Silva, was a sub-contractor under Sturdivant for a portion of the work, was taken before Carstens received any notice, it cannot be considered as against him. It was not repeated after he received notice and no evidence indicating any relation whatever between Carstens and the other parties, or the applicant, was introduced after the notice was served upon him. As a decision against him it is without the support of any legal evidence.

[5] Inasmuch as it is within the power of the Commission, if we should annul the award upon these objections, to proceed to another hearing, after due notice to Carstens, it is necessary to consider another proposition urged by the petitioner, and which goes to the authority of the Commission to make an award in any case against the owner of property who is erecting a building thereon, through an independent contractor, and whose only relation to the person sustaining the injury is that he is the owner of the property upon which an independent contractor is erecting a building in his own way and without control of the owner, and where the person injured is in the employ of such contractor, or of a subcontractor to whom the contractor has sublet a portion of the work. We are of the opinion that the judicial power of the Commission does not extend to such case. The authority of the Legislature to confer judicial power upon the Commission is derived wholly from the provisions of section 21, art. 20 of the Constitution. As was said in Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, supra:

"Clearly the second clause of this section, authorizing the Legislature to provide for the settlement of disputes by * * * a commission, has no broader scope than the first clause, which sanctions the creation of the liability. The disputes which may thus be settled are those 'arising under the legislation contemplated by this section.' It would not avail, therefore, to say that the Legislature has power, independently of this special constitutional authorization, to create a liability, * * * unless it also has the power, without express constitutional sanction, to vest in the Industrial Accident Commission the power to make awards in such cases."

The question, therefore, depends upon the effect of the language of the first sentence of the section. It reads as follows:

"The Legislature may by appropriate legislation create and enforce a liability on the part of all employers to compensate their employes for any injury incurred by the said employes in the course of their employment, irrespective of the fault of either party. The Legislature may provide for the settlement of any disputes arising under the legislation contemplated by this section, by arbitration, or by an industrial accident board, by the courts, or by either, any or all of these agencies, anything in this Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding."

The Legislation thus authorized includes only the power to "create and enforce a liability on the part of all employers." Clearly this does not include the power to create and enforce a liability on the part of any person not an employer, to compensate persons employed by others and who do not sustain to him the relation of employé. Without regard to the question whether the Legislature may create such a liability against persons not employers, it does not have the power, under that section, to create courts, or commissions having judicial power, for the settlement of disputes concerning such liability and to enforce the same. Such liabilities must be settled and enforced through the ordinary courts established by and under section 1, art. 6 of the Constitution. That section provides that:

"The judicial power of the state shall be vested in the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, in a Supreme Court, District Courts of Appeal, superior courts and such inferior courts as the Legislature may establish in any incorporated city or town, township, county, or city and county."

In Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, the court said with regard to this section:

"Except for local purposes, the section disposes of the whole judicial power of the state, and vests all of it in the courts expressly named therein, leaving none at the disposal of the Legislature."

Inasmuch as section 21 aforesaid does not authorize the Legislature to commit to any courts, other than those authorized by section 1, art. 6, the settlement of liabilities against persons not employers, it follows necessarily that the Commission has no authority to settle or enforce a liability against Carstens in favor of Silva unless he was the employer of Silva. The liability here sought to be enforced arises under section 30 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. This section provides that principals, meaning in this case the owner of a lot who has let a contract for the erection of a building thereon, may be held liable for an accidental injury to an employé of a subcontractor. Such owner does not sustain the relation of an employer to those who work for such contractor or for the subcontractor under him. The liability does not arise out of the relation of employer and employé, but exists, if at all, solely by reason of the relationship of owner as provided in section 30. It is not a liability the enforcement of which the Legislature has power to commit to any tribunal other than the regularly constituted courts under article 6. It follows, therefore, that the Commission has no jurisdiction of the claim of Silva so far as the owner, Carstens, is concerned, that the award against him is null, and that the proceeding cannot be further maintained.

The question whether or not the Legislature has power to create such a liability against the owner of property is one which we do not find it necessary to decide, and upon which we express no opinion.

It is ordered that the award of the Commission against the petitioner, H. F. Carstens, be annulled, and that the proceeding against him be dismissed.

STURDIVANT v. PILLSBURY et al., Industrial Accident Commission. (Sac. 2386.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 22, 1916.)

MASTER AND SERVANT §367—INJURIES TO SERVANT—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—AUTHORITY OF COMMISSION.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1913, p. 294) § 30, the Industrial Accident Commission cannot enforce claim of an employé of a subcontractor against the principal contractor, the relation of employer and employé not existing.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Application by James W. Sturdivant for writ of review against A. J. Pillsbury and others, constituting the Industrial Accident Commission. Writ issued, and award against petitioner annulled, and proceeding dismissed.

Driver & Driver, of Sacramento, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for defendants.

SHAW, J. This is an original proceeding in review under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act. A decision in the companion case of Carstens v. Pillsbury (Sac. No. 2387) 158 Pac. 218, has this day been filed. The only difference between the two cases is that in this case Sturdivant, the general contractor, is the petitioner, and that he was named in the application for relief made by Silva to the Commission, and that notice was duly served upon him. So far as the question of due process of law is concerned, he has no cause of complaint, except that some evidence was taken in his absence and without notice to him, as stated in the aforesaid opinion.

It appears, however, that he was not the employer of Silva; that he was the general contractor for the building erected for Carstens upon the latter's property; that he sublet a portion of the work to James Common; that Common was the contractor for the portion of the work sublet to him; and that the relation of employer and employé did not exist between Sturdivant and Silva. In Carstens v. Pillsbury we have considered the question of the power of the Legislature to confer judicial authority upon the Commission to inquire into, determine, and enforce liabilities under section 30 of the act, in favor of the employé against persons other than his employer, and have reached the conclusion that the Legislature has no such power and, consequently that the Commission cannot entertain such proceedings. The same principles apply with equal force to the present case. On the authority of that decision we hold that the Commission cannot proceed further in this case.

It is ordered that the award of the Commission in favor of Silva against Sturdivant be annulled, and that the proceeding as against him be dismissed.

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1916.)

1. STIPULATIONS §14(12) — CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

In an action on a note, a stipulation which provided that plaintiff would accept a smaller amount if defendant made payment in a certain manner, and in the event of failure for a period of 15 days to pay at the times and in the manner specified, plaintiff to have judgment for the full amount, with interest of said note, did not mean that the plaintiff was obliged to wait 15 days after default before exercising his right to sue on the note, but that, if he exercised his right to treat the agreement as a nullity and sued within 15 days, defendant was free to invoke any defense open to him in resisting payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. §§ 36, 37; Dec. Dig. §14(12).]

2. COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT §5(3)—VALIDITY—CONSIDERATION—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 1524, providing that part performance of an obligation before or after a breach, when accepted by the creditor in writing, as satisfaction, or rendered pursuant to an agreement in writing for that purpose, although without new consideration, extinguishes the obligation, an oral agreement made without consideration that defendant might have a reasonable time beyond the 15 days of grace within which to make payments provided for in a stipulation is not binding upon the plaintiff, and constitutes no legal excuse for a default made in payment called for by the stipulation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Compromise and Settlement, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. §5(3).]

3. PLEADING §349—JUDGMENT ON ANSWER.

In an action on a note, an answer denying that the money had been paid on the note, and alleging that the obligation of the note had been extinguished by the execution of a new agreement or stipulation in another action raised no issue and authorized judgment on the pleadings, where it showed that defendant was in default under the stipulation.

4. PLEADING §106(2) — MATTER IN ABATEMENT—SUIT PENDING.

In an action on a note a plea in abatement of another action pending which contained no allegation from which it could be determined when the action pleaded in abatement had been brought was insufficient, since, if the action so pleaded was not pending at the time of the commencement of this suit, it would not furnish cause for abatement.

5. PLEADING 106(1) — PLEA AND ABATEMENT.

Pleas in abatement are not favored and should be judged with strictness.

6. JUDGMENT 949(7)—MERGER AND BAR—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action on a note, a plea of a judgment rendered in a former action separately set out as a plea in bar in the answer was insufficient, where it appeared that said judgment had not become final, and determined, in effect, that the plaintiffs' suit was prematurely brought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1801; Dec. Dig. 949(7).]

7. PLEADING 236(6) — AMENDMENTS — DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where an inspection of an offered amended answer shows that as to the merits of the case the defense was practically identical with that stated in the original answer, its refusal was not an abuse of discretion in the trial judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 601; Dec. Dig. 236(6).]

8. STIPULATION 10—VALIDITY—CONSIDERATION.

Where a stipulation was filed in an action, and the parties acted in pursuance of its provisions for several months thereafter, it cannot be said to be without consideration as a stipulation controlling the proceeding in the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. § 22; Dec. Dig. 10.]

In Bank. Appeals from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Two actions by Henriette Scheeline and others against D. B. Moshier. In the first there was judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss. In the second there was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for appellant. S. Wyman Smith, of Bakersfield (E. J. Emmons, of Bakersfield, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. The appeals presented in the above-entitled cases are from judgments rendered in separate actions founded upon the same obligation, namely, a promissory note for $1,879.55, executed by the defendant to the plaintiffs, dated December 27, 1909, due one day after date, with 6 per cent. interest until paid. Said note has been the subject of three actions between the parties. The first action was begun before the commencement of either of the actions embraced in these appeals. In case No. 4201 judgment was given for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal. In case No. 4225 judgment was given in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendant for the balance of the principal and interest due upon said note, and the defendant appeals. The appeal in each case was taken to the District Court of Appeal of the Second District. That court took up the cases separately and made separate decisions thereon at different times, first reversing the judgment for the defendant in case No. 4201, and then affirming the judgment for the plaintiff in No. 4225. Afterwards the cases were transferred to this court for rehearing. Upon further consideration we find that the District Court correctly decided the cases, and we approve the opinions rendered in that court in case No. 4201 by Mr. Justice Shaw and in case No. 4225 by Mr. Justice James.

[1, 2] The opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw is as follows:

"This was an action brought to recover upon a promissory note made by the defendant whereby he promised to pay plaintiff the sum of $1,879.55. This note had formed the basis of a prior suit between the same parties for recovery thereon. After defendant had interposed a demurrer to the complaint in this first suit, a stipulation was filed therein whereby plaintiff agreed to accept $1,500 in full payment of the note and interest, provided the same should be paid in the following manner, to wit: $100 on September 20, 1912, and $100 on the 20th day of each month thereafter until the sum of $500 should be paid; $100 on the 20th day of August, 1913, and $100 on the 20th day of each and every month thereafter until the balance of said sum of $1,500 was paid. Defendant made the first five payments in accordance with the stipulation, but neglected and failed to make the payment of $100 stipulated to be paid on August 20th, as well as the payments thereafter agreed to be made. After such default, and on August 23d, plaintiff instituted this action to recover the full amount and interest as specified in said promissory note.

"Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. By the terms of the stipulation the defendant covenanted and agreed to pay said $1,500 in the manner and at the times therein specified, and further agreed 'that in the event he fails for a period of 15 days to make any of the payments * * * specified at the times * * * mentioned, then and in that event the said plaintiff may have judgment for the full amount of the principal and interest of said note, together with costs.' The court found, among other things, that notwithstanding the failure to make said payment on the 20th of August as provided in said stipulation, nevertheless the defendant was not in default on account thereof by reason of the fact that the action was instituted within what it designated 'the 15 days of grace allowed by the terms of said stipulation.'

"We do not so interpret the stipulation. The agreement on the part of plaintiff was to accept the $1,500 in full payment provided it was paid in the manner therein specified, and the specifications called for the payment of $100 on August 20th. Defendant agreed so to make the payments. He further agreed that, if he failed to make any payment for a period of 15 days after the time so specified, plaintiff might take judgment against him for the full amount of principal and interest. In other words, had plaintiff waited 15 days after the 20th day of August it might have invoked such provision in the stipulation, claiming that defendant was estopped from making any defense to the action, since he had agreed in such event that plaintiff should have judgment for the full amount of said note with costs of suit. The stipulation cannot be construed as requiring plaintiff to wait 15 days after default before exercising its right to sue upon the note; and hence, having elected to sue upon default in the making of the payment called for on August 20th, and before the expiration of the 15 days, defendant was free to invoke any defense open to him in resisting payment of said note. So construed, the finding of the court to the effect that no default had been made in the payments provided by said stipulation is unsupported by the evidence.

"The court further found that plaintiff, in December, 1912, agreed that the defendant might have a reasonable time beyond the 15 days of grace within which to make the said payments provided for in the stipulation. This alleged agreement was oral, and no consideration was paid therefor. The general rule is that, where there is no new consideration, and no benefit accruing to the creditor, and no damage to the debtor, the creditor may violate with legal impunity the promise so made to his debtor to accept a lesser sum than that due, however freely and understandingly made. Brooks v. White, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 283, 37 Am. Dec. 95. The contention of the respondent, however, is that this general rule has been modified in this state by section 1524, Civil Code, which provides: 'Part performance of an obligation, either before or after a breach thereof, when expressly accepted by the creditor in writing, in satisfaction, or rendered in pursuance of an agreement in writing for that purpose, though without any new consideration, extinguishes the obligation.' Accepting respondent's interpretation of this provision, it applies to written agreements only. The only writing was the stipulation filed in the prior suit, whereby plaintiff agreed to accept $1,500 provided it should be paid as therein specified. Such oral agreement, made without consideration, was not binding upon plaintiff, and constitutes no legal excuse for the default made in the payment, called for on August 20th by the terms of the stipulation. Simmons v. Hamilton, 56 Cal. 495."

[3-7] The opinion of Mr. Justice James is as follows:

"This action was brought to recover an alleged balance due on a promissory note executed by defendant. An answer was filed and a motion thereafter made on the part of plaintiffs for judgment on the pleadings because of the alleged failure of the answer to present an issue. This motion was by the court granted. After the motion for judgment on the pleadings had been presented, but before decision of the court was made thereon, the defendant presented and asked leave to file an amended answer, which leave was denied. He thereafter appealed from the judgment, and states in his notice of appeal that he also appeals from the order denying his application for leave to file the amended answer.

"Without giving attention to the objection made by the respondents touching the alleged imperfections in the record which appellant presents here, the main questions sought to be reviewed will be considered.

"The judgment on the pleadings, in our opinion, was rightly entered. By the answer defendant admitted the allegations of the complaint as to the copartnership of the plaintiffs and as to the execution of the promissory note sued upon, and then denied that the money had been paid thereon, and alleged that the obligation of the note had been extinguished by the execution of a new agreement or stipulation made in another action. The stipulation was set out in full in the answer, and it appears by inspection thereof that the defendant was in default under the stipulation at the time of the commencement of this action. This court recently considered that stipulation and held that a judgment in favor of defendant in a former suit on the note should be reversed. See Scheeline et al. v. Moshier (Civil No. 1584), reported just above. Applying the conclusions reached in that case to the first defense set up by the defendant in his answer here, it is apparent that there was no issue raised by the denial as to payment, nor the allegation as to the agreement stipulated having been substituted in place of the note obligation.

"The alleged pleas in abatement and in bar were insufficient. The first plea was in the following words: 'This defendant alleges: (1) That there is another action pending between the same parties for the same cause of action, to wit, that certain action No. 8731 in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Kern.' There was no allegation expressed from which it could be determined when the action pleaded in abatement had been brought. If that action so pleaded was not pending at the time of the commencement of this suit, then it would not furnish cause for the abatement of the latter. The pleading of this issue should have been as broad as the essential facts necessary to be proved to sustain it. On the sufficiency of such a defense, see Vance v. Olinger, 27 Cal. 358; Martin v. Splivalo, 69 Cal. 611, 11 Pac. 484. Pleas in abatement are not favored and should be judged with strictness. California Savings & Loan Society v. Harris, 111 Cal. 133, 43 Pac. 525.

"The plea of a judgment rendered in the former action, as separately set out as a plea in bar in the answer, was insufficient for the reason that it appeared that said judgment had not become final. Furthermore, on the face of it, the judgment was not such an adjudication as would bar the bringing of this action, which was commenced about two months after the entry of that judgment. The first judgment determined, in effect, that plaintiff's suit was prematurely brought. The complaint in this action fairly showed a cause of action in favor of the plaintiffs accruing at and subsequent to the time alleged in the complaint in the former suit.

"The plea of a tender was not sufficient; the tender alleged was not made in time.

"It will not be necessary to analyze the allegations of the amended answer and determine whether respondents are correct in stating that the contents thereof do not assist in stating a better defense than was stated in the answer filed. An inspection of the offered amended answer shows that as to the merits of the case the defense was practically identical with that stated in the original answer. Under such circumstances it was not, in our opinion, an abuse of discretion for the trial judge to refuse to allow the amended answer to be filed."

We are satisfied that the construction given by the District Court of Appeal to the stipulation filed in the original action on the note is correct. It was by its terms made conditional. The acceptance of $1,500 (less than the sum admitted to be due) was to take place "providing" the payment thereof was made in the "manner" therein specified; not otherwise. If not so made, plaintiff was not bound. The manner provided was the payment of installments of $100 each at stated times. Upon failure to pay any installment at the stated time, the condition failed, and the plaintiff had then the right to treat the stipulation as a nullity, so far as the original obligation was concerned, and hold the defendant to the contract evidenced by the note.

"Upon the breach of the terms of an agreement or abandonment by one party thereto, the other party may treat the agreement as a nullity and be remitted to his original cause of action." 8 Cyc. 535.

This right is not affected by the subsequent clause providing for judgment in that action when the failure had continued for 15 days. That clause gave authority to proceed in that action and cut off the defendant's privilege of making defenses therein in that event, but it was not exclusive and it does not purport to change the rights of the plaintiff arising from a breach of the condition.

[8] As the stipulation was filed in the action, and the parties acted in pursuance of its provisions for several months thereafter, it cannot be said to be without consideration as a stipulation controlling the proceeding in the action. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, p. 711; Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 287, 288, 30 Pac. 529.

As the District Court took up the cases separately and decided them at different times, it properly reversed the judgment and order in case No. 4201 and remanded the cause for a new trial. But, as we are now considering them together, we may go further. The judgment in No. 4225, being a just determination of the rights of the parties, should stand as it is. In the other case the judgment and order should not only be reversed, but the case should be dismissed by the lower court. It is clear that the defendant had no meritorious defense to the note. The defenses he proposes to raise grow out of technical matters of procedure in the efforts of the plaintiffs to enforce payment of a just debt. The judgment in No. 4225 gives plaintiffs all they ask for or can obtain in the way of relief. Further litigation in case No. 4201 will be entirely useless and fruitless to either party. If that case is dismissed, the plaintiffs will be chargeable with the costs of that action. In this we perceive no injustice.

In case No. 4201 the judgment and order are reversed and the cause remanded to the court below with directions to dismiss the action.

In case No. 4225 the judgment is affirmed.

Complaint, alleging defendant owned and published a paper of general circulation and published therein an article referring to a divorce suit in which plaintiff was named as co-respondent, setting forth the article, which boldly referred to plaintiff, through a copy of the petition, as an "affinity," and that such word had a definite local meaning as one having illicit sexual relation, that defendant so used the word and so intended, sufficiently states a cause of action for libel, since it does not show on its face that the article was a full,

Appeal from Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Robert J. Riley against the Evening Post Publishing Company. Judgment for defendant on order sustaining demurrer and plaintiff's refusal to plead further, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

Milton A. Nathan, of San Francisco, for appellant. C. H. Wilson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action for libel rendered upon the order of the court sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiff's second amended complaint, the plaintiff having declined to further amend his pleading.

The plaintiff's said complaint alleges that the defendant, a corporation, is the owner and publisher of a certain newspaper of general circulation known as "The San Francisco Post"; that on or about the 28th day of April, 1913, one Patrick Farrelly commenced an action for divorce against his wife Flora Farrelly in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and on June 19, 1913, filed an amended complaint therein, to which on August 19, 1913, his said wife filed an answer and cross-complaint; that on August 20, 1913, the defendant caused to be published in said newspaper an article having reference to said divorce action, which article is set forth in full in said complaint, and wherein under sensational headlines it is stated that Patrick Farrelly in his complaint in said divorce action accuses his wife of having two "affinities," of whom this plaintiff is named as one, who visited his home in his absence. It is also stated that the wife charges in her pleadings that her relations with Riley (the plaintiff herein) were not without the knowledge of her husband. The complaint in this action further alleges that said publication was false, libelous, malicious, and defamatory, and also avers that the term "affinity," as used in said article and applied to the plaintiff therein, has a definite, provincial, and local meaning, viz., that it designates a person who bears an illicit sexual relation to another person of the opposite sex; and that said defendant in said publication used said word in that sense, and intended thereby to publish and assert that said Patrick Farrelly accused the said plaintiff of having illicit sexual relations with his wife; and that the same was in fact so understood by the readers of said article.

[1, 2] It seems perfectly plain to this court that a complaint couched in the foregoing terms states a cause of action for libel; and that it does not appear upon the face thereof that the article published by the defendant in said newspaper was "a fair and true report, without malice, of a judicial proceeding," and was for that reason a privileged publication. On the contrary, it clearly appears that said publication, in so far as it states that Patrick Farrelly in said divorce action accuses this plaintiff of having sexual relations with Farrelly's wife, is false, libelous, malicious, and defamatory. In actions for libel the plea of privilege is defensive matter, which cannot be raised on demurrer unless the complaint affirmatively shows that the report complained of as libelous is a fair and true report, without malice, of a judicial proceeding; and, as we have seen, the exact opposite appears upon the face of this complaint.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the defendant's demurrer to the second amended complaint, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by J. M. Morrow and another against George E. Wells. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing denied; Shaw, J., dissenting.

L. L. Cory, of Fresno, and Shepard & Shepard, of Selma, for appellant. Everts & Ewing and Gallaher & Aten, all of Fresno, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This action was brought to recover the sum of $1,080, claimed to have been wrongfully withheld by defendant. Plaintiffs recovered judgment for the sum of $859.69, and this appeal is from such judgment.

The controversy arose out of the sale of certain lands situated in the county of Fresno, the facts being substantially as follows: On the 4th day of March, 1912, the defendant George E. Wells entered into a written contract to sell to plaintiffs the land in question. At that time one C. B. Darneal, a son-in-law of the vendor Wells, was in possession of the premises under a certain lease, by the terms of which Darneal had agreed to properly farm, cultivate, care for, and market the crop of fruit growing thereon for the year 1912, and was to receive for his services one-half of the proceeds thereof, and the land was sold subject to such lease. Darneal harvested the fruit and some hay, sold the same, and accounted to Wells, but withheld from the plaintiffs their share, alleged to be the sum sued for. By the terms and conditions of the contract of sale, the vendees of the land, plaintiffs herein, agreed to pay the sum of $6,750 for the land with interest on deferred payments at the rate of 7½ per cent. per annum. In substance, the agreement provided for the payment of $200 cash in advance, balance of interest payable September 1, 1912. All interest thereafter was payable in advance on the 1st day of September of each year, $250 on the principal September 1, 1913, and a like amount each year thereafter until a certain amount was paid, when a new arrangement or agreement was to be made. As part of the terms of the contract and as further security for the payments stipulated for, it was provided that plaintiffs should execute to the defendant Wells a mortgage on the crops raised on the premises; said mortgage to cover one-half of the crops for the year 1912, and to extend to all of the crops raised during certain succeeding years. In conformity with this clause of the contract, a crop mortgage was executed by plaintiff in favor of defendant Wells. At or about the time specified for the first payment under the contract, on September 1, 1912, defendant Wells became dissatisfied with the contract, and the record shows that he endeavored to avoid carrying out its terms; in fact, it is fairly manifest that he concluded to treat the contract as at an end so far as he was concerned, and from that time on he managed the property as his own, confusing the crops with those raised on his home place. As further evidence of this fact, he endeavored to evade a tender due from the purchasers, who thereupon deposited the same to his credit in the Union National Bank of Fresno. In addition to this, it is in evidence that Wells expressly declared that he considered the contract at an end.

Defendant seeks to escape liability for the performance of the contract on the following grounds: (1) It is their claim that it was the duty of the plaintiffs to care for and protect the growing crops, and that, they having neglected so to do, the defendant was compelled to install a pumping plant and to furnish trays and sweat-boxes, and market the products at his own expense; (2) because of the fact that the mortgage was given to cover the whole balance of the purchase price due under the contract of sale, that the vendor was entitled to retain all the sums received from the sale of the fruit, and apply them on the contract.

[1] With reference to the first contention, it is sufficient to say that the trial court found upon conflicting evidence that no boxes or trays were ever furnished by defendant, and that no pumping plant was ever installed or was ever needed to protect the crops. This finding is amply supported by the evidence, and under the familiar rule cannot be disturbed on appeal.

[2] Equally untenable is the second contention. In the very terms of the contract of sale the amount to become due thereunder was definitely provided for. The mere fact that the crop mortgage was given as security for the full amount due under the contract does not thereby qualify the express terms of the contract in this respect. These two instruments were made at the same time and depended upon each other, and were in effect one contract. From a reading of the two instruments it is clearly manifest that the intention of the parties was to have the profits of the land insure the payments due under the contract according to the terms provided for therein, and these payments were specific amounts at specified times.

No other questions are presented.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Martin L. Gates against Gertrude Julia Cunningham, administratrix. From a judgment for defendant and order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stafford & Stafford and W. P. Caubu, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Martin Uldall, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant and from an order denying the plaintiff a new trial, in an action wherein the plaintiff sought to recover the sum of $1,900 upon a rejected claim against the estate of George W. Rapp, deceased. The plaintiff's cause of action was rested primarily upon allegations of fact substantially as follows:

Martin L. Gates and Julia Gates were husband and wife. During their married life they accumulated by their joint efforts the sum of $1,900, which was community property. This money was deposited by the wife in the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company in the city of San Francisco, with the knowledge, consent and approval of her husband. A short time prior to her death, viz., on June 21, 1914, the wife, without the knowledge or consent of her husband, gave to George Rapp, the deceased, an order upon the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company for the $1,900 which she had on deposit there. Rapp presented the order to the bank. It was honored, and the money withdrawn and deposited in the name of and to the credit of Rapp in the Humboldt Savings Bank. Thereafter, and until the time of his death, July 11, 1914, Rapp claimed to hold and own such sum as his individual property. The defendant's answer denied all of the material allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, save and except the allegation of the presentation and rejection of the claim against the estate of the deceased.

Upon the issues thus framed the cause was tried by the court without a jury, and its findings of fact were, in substance and effect, that Martin L. Gates and his wife, Julia Gates, did not while living together as husband and wife accumulate the sum of $1,900 or any sum of money whatever of which she, the wife, had control, and which she deposited in the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company; that Julia Gates did not on the 21st day of June, 1914, give to George Rapp, the deceased, an order upon said bank or any other bank for the sum of $1,900, or any other sum, but that said Julia Gates did on or about the 29th day of January, 1914, upon the death of Gertrude Rapp, the mother of Julia Gates and George Rapp, deceased, transfer an account in the sum of $2,062.21, which stood upon the books of the Savings Union & Trust Company in the joint names of Julia Gates and Gertrude Rapp, her mother, to the joint account of Julia Gates and George Rapp, deceased; that said sum of money so transferred was not nor was any part thereof the community property of Martin L. Gates and Julia Gates.

The only point presented in support of the appeal is that the findings of the court to the effect that the money in suit was not the community property of Gates and his wife is contrary to the evidence. The evidence upon this phase of the case is direct and circumstantial, and is, in our opinion, in substantial conflict. The evidence adduced in support of the plaintiff's case tended to show, in substance, that Julia Gates, about January 5, 1900, and while she was the wife of the plaintiff, deposited the sum of $10 with the Savings Union Bank, now known as the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company; and from time to time thereafter added to her account several small deposits until April 21, 1901, when she had to her credit and in her name the sum of $121.13. On the last-mentioned date this account, which was entered as an "ordinary deposit," was transferred to a "term deposit account," and continued in her name until December 31, 1902, at which time it aggregated the sum of $209.81. On March 11, 1903, this account was transferred to Mrs. Gertrude Rapp (the mother of Julia Gates), and while standing in her name was on March 26, 1903, increased by a single deposit of $250. On July 30, 1904, the balance of $180.68 remaining to the credit of the last-mentioned account was transferred to Julia Gates as a savings deposit account, and numbered 92,003, which was the number originally assigned to the account of Julia Gates when she made her first deposit with the bank. This account stood in the name of Julia Gates until July 18, 1911, at which time it showed a balance in her favor of the sum of $1,776.89 as the result of numerous and frequent deposits ranging in amounts from $10 to $100. On the last-mentioned date this account was again transferred from Julia Gates to "Julia Gates or Gertrude Rapp," and on and after December 31, 1911, was augmented by other deposits varying in amount from $35 to $100. On July 29, 1914, it aggregated the sum of $2,062.21, when it was transferred to "Julia Gates or George Rapp."

[1, 2] It may be conceded, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, that the fact that the initial and subsequent deposits of money credited to the several accounts standing in the name of Julia Gates were made while she was the wife of the plaintiff created the presumption that the money thus deposited was community property. This, however, was a disputable presumption, and was, we think, overcome by other evidence in the case, direct and circumstantial, which tended to show that the money in suit nor any part thereof was accumulated as the result of the joint earnings of the plaintiff and the deceased, but rather was accumulated from the personal income of Mrs. Gertrude Rapp and her son, the decedent, George Rapp, and that the deceased merely held and handled the same in her name as their agent and trustee. Thus there was much convincing evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was a man of intemperate habits, and as a consequence earned but little money during his married life, which was never at any time wholly sufficient to supply the community necessities of husband and wife. True, the evidence shows that Julia Gates also contributed to the support of the community by working as a seamstress, but she secured such work only irregularly, and oftentimes, owing to frequent ill health, was unable for months to work at all, with the result that her average weekly earnings were from $7 to $9, which, it appears, when added to the intermittent earnings of the plaintiff, were no more than sufficient to provide for the daily needs of the community. This being so, it is improbable that Julia Gates could have saved any sum out of the community earnings, and it is highly improbable that she could have saved so large a sum as $2,000. The money in suit therefore must have come from some source other than the joint or individual earnings of Gates and his wife.

This conclusion is fortified by the undisputed fact that the deceased was regarded by her mother, Mrs. Gertrude Rapp, as the business head of the Rapp family, and as such was intrusted with the family money, and that her mother upon several occasions gave her certain sums of money to be deposited in bank.

The foregoing is but a meager outline of the evidence adduced upon the whole case; but it will suffice, we think, to show that the presumption relied upon by the plaintiff was overcome by clear, certain, and convincing evidence within the meaning and character of such evidence as defined in the cases of Lynam v. Vorwerk, 13 Cal. App. 509, 110 Pac. 355, and Freese v. Hibernia, etc., Society, 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

2. DEATH $\S$ 2(1) — PRESUMPTION — UNEXPLAINED ABSENCE.

Both under the general law, and the provision of a benefit certificate, that whenever any court of competent jurisdiction should adjudge that a member had not been seen or heard of during seven consecutive years it should be presumptive proof of his death, such presumption of death arose when seven years had elapsed after the disappearance of the insured.

3. DEATH $\S$ 2(2)—PRESUMPTION—DATE.

Upon the presumption of death arising after the unexplained absence of an insured for seven years both under the general law and a provision of certificate, the date of his death during such period was not proven, so that the beneficiaries were entitled to wait the termination of the seven-year period before commencing their action.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Mary Linneweber and others against Supreme Council Catholic Knights of America. Judgment for defendant, motion for new trial denied, and plaintiffs appeal. Judgment and order reversed.

F. W. Von Schrader and Von Schrader & Cadwalader, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Walter Christie and F. J. Kierce, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $2,000 alleged to be due to plaintiffs from the defendant upon a beneficial policy or certificate of insurance issued by the latter to one James Martin, and made payable to "Bernard Linneweber, or in case of his death to his children," as the beneficiaries thereof.

The facts of the case, out of which the defendant's liability is alleged to have arisen, are contained in an agreed statement of facts presented at the trial of the cause, and which is substantially as follows: The policy or certificate of membership of James Martin in the defendant association was issued in the year 1882, and he continued to be and was a member in good standing therein up to and upon April 18, 1906, the date of the earthquake and fire in the city and county of San Francisco. He was then 75 years of age, and was afflicted with a number of the disabilities which attend old age. He was seen immediately after the earthquake in front of the hotel in which he stayed and which was within the district presently swept by the fire. He disappeared, however, at the time of said fire, and has never been seen or heard of thereafter. In the month of December, 1906, he was suspended by the defendant association for nonpayment of dues. Thereafter and in 1909 Bernard Linneweber, his immediate beneficiary, died. The plaintiffs herein are his only children. On April 22, 1913, this action was commenced to recover the amount of said policy.

The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the general ground and also upon several alleged grounds of uncertainty, which demurrer being overruled an answer was filed, putting in issue the material averments of the complaint, and also pleading the bar of the statute of limitations. Upon the trial the agreed statement of facts was presented from which the foregoing facts appear, and wherein are also set forth the following material parts of the policy or certificate of insurance upon which the respective parties rely to sustain or defeat this action:

"Sec. 197. Whenever any competent court having jurisdiction at the last known domicile of an insured member shall render judgment to the effect that the member has not been seen or heard from during a period of seven consecutive years prior to the date of the judgment, the same shall be presumptive proof of his death, and his benefit certificate shall at once become due and payable as if he were really proven dead. The judgment of court shall be furnished at cost of beneficiary."

"Sec. 134. No action at law or in equity at any court shall be brought or maintained on any cause or claim arising out of any membership or benefit certificate, unless such action is brought within three years from the time when such right of action accrues."

It is agreed that these two sections of the policy or certificate of insurance were in effect at the time of the disappearance of said James Martin. Subsequently and in the year 1910 section 197 was amended to read as follows:

"In case a member of this order disappears from his home or state, there shall be no presumption of the death of such member. If, after seven years dating from such disappearance the beneficiary or beneficiaries shall establish the fact of death of such member in a court of record having common law jurisdiction, to which proceeding the Supreme Council Catholic Knights of America shall be a party, the benefit shall be paid."

Upon the trial and submission of the cause the trial court made its findings of fact embodying substantially the matters contained in the agreed statement of facts, but finding expressly therefrom that James Martin died on April 18, 1906, and also making the express finding that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of the defendant, and from such judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial the plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

[1-4] We are of the opinion that the trial court was in error in its conclusion that this action was barred by the statute of limitations and in its judgment based thereon. Section 197 of the policy or certificate of insurance as it read on April 18, 1906, and not as it was amended to read in July, 1910, must be held to control the rights and liabilities of the respective parties. If it be a fact, as the court found, that James Martin died on April 18, 1906, the finding of the court that James Martin did die on that date is supported by the presumption of death, which by the terms of said section as well as by the general law arises when a period of seven years has elapsed after the disappearance of the person. By this presumption the fact of the death of said person is proven, but not the date of his death at any particular time during the seven-year period; but the court had before it certain other facts, such as the extreme age and bodily infirmities of the deceased, and also the fact of the peril in which he was when last seen. These would not have been sufficient to establish the fact of the death of James Martin so as to have enabled these plaintiffs to maintain this action during the seven-year period; but they would be sufficient to sustain the finding of the court fixing the date of the decedent's death after the presumption had sufficed to prove the fact of his death. Under these conditions, the case of Benjamin v. District Grand Lodge, etc. (Sup.) 152 Pac. 731, has direct and controlling application to the case at bar. Under the authority of that case, as well as under the express terms of section 197 of the policy or certificate of insurance, these plaintiffs, if, as the beneficiaries of James Martin, they were entitled to sue at all, were entitled to await the termination of the seven-year period which would give rise to the presumption of Martin's death before commencing their action; and, this being so, the statute of limitation could not have operated as a bar to this action.

[5] It need hardly be suggested that if in fact, as the court found, James Martin died on April 18, 1906, he could not have been lawfully suspended from the association for nonpayment of dues at any time thereafter; nor would his beneficiaries have been bound to keep such dues paid in order to preserve their right to receive the benefit accruing by virtue of his membership in good standing at the time of his death upon proper proof of the fact and date of his decease.

It follows necessarily that the court was in error in its finding and judgment herein based upon the plea of the statute of limitations.

[6] The respondent, however, contends that the plaintiffs herein cannot recover because they were not shown to have capacity to sue nor to be the proper parties plaintiff, for the reason that while it was conceded that they were the only children of their deceased father, Bernard Linneweber, the immediate beneficiary of James Martin, it was not pleaded or proven that there had been any probate of their said father's estate. We think this issue should have been tendered by the defendant in some specific pleading, and that the objection comes too late upon this appeal.

[7] It is agreed that these plaintiffs are the only children of Bernard Linneweber, and hence the only surviving beneficiaries under the terms of the policy. It was not shown that there was any other estate or any creditors of Bernard Linneweber. At the time of his death James Martin was still presumed to be living, and hence no right of property or of action on this policy had accrued under its terms. It thus appearing that these plaintiffs are the real and, so far as the record discloses, the only parties in interest in this action, we think they were entitled to maintain it in the absence of affirmative pleading and proof on the part of the defendant to the contrary.

Judgment and order reversed.

1. BILLS AND NOTES ⇨489(1)—ACTIONS—DEMURRER—QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

In an action between original parties to a written instrument, the substance of which is pleaded, and from which it appears defendant agreed to pay money for value received but on proper demand has failed and refused to pay, the question whether the instrument is negotiable in form or certainties does not arise on demurrer to complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by the Banca Commerciale Italiana Di Genova against P. Schlegel & Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

Cushing & Cushing and Wm. S. McKnight, all of San Francisco, for appellant. F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This action was commenced by plaintiff to recover from the defendant the amount of a foreign draft, drawn in plaintiff's favor and accepted by the defendant. A demurrer to the original complaint was sustained, whereupon an amended complaint was filed setting out more fully the circumstances under which the draft was drawn, but to which a general demurrer was also sustained without leave to amend. The plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from the judgment thereupon entered in defendant's favor.

The amended complaint alleges that on February 13, 1913, Bonavera & Daffiene, a firm in Italy, executed and delivered to the plaintiff a written instrument negotiable in form and referred to in said pleading as a bill of exchange, whereby they ordered and directed defendant to pay within 90 days after sight to the plaintiff in San Francisco the sum of fcs. 3,745.90 lawful money of the republic of France in lawful money of the United States at the rate then existing in San Francisco for sight drafts on Paris; that a bill of lading for certain goods accompanied said draft, which was to be delivered to the defendant upon its presentation and payment; that thereafter on March 17, 1913, the plaintiff delivered said bill of lading to the defendant, who thereupon promised and agreed to pay said draft or bill of exchange, and as evidence thereof wrote upon the face of said document the words "Accepted March 17, 1913. P. Schlegel & Co."; that upon delivery to it of the said bill of lading the said defendant presented the same to the carrier having in charge the goods called for by its terms and of which the sum named in said draft was the purchase price, and received possession of the same, which were of the value of the sum specified in said draft; that on June 5, 1913, the said plaintiff presented said bill of exchange to said defendant for payment, and demanded the said sum of fcs. 3,745.90, which at the rate then existing in San Francisco for sight drafts on Paris was of the value of $723.85, but which sum the defendant has refused and failed to pay. Wherefore the plaintiff prays judgment for said sum.

The demurrer to this complaint was general and was sustained by the trial court.

[1, 2] We think its ruling in that regard was error. This is an action between the original parties to a written instrument, the substance of which is pleaded, and from which it appears the defendant promised and agreed to pay the sum of money specified therein for value received, which upon proper demand it has failed and refused to do. Whether or not the writing was such in form or in its certainties as to constitute a negotiable instrument is a question which does not arise on demurrer in an action between the original parties to it, and which is not presented upon the record before us; it will not therefore be considered upon this appeal.

The objections which the respondent urges to the complaint otherwise all apparently go to matters of uncertainty which would not avail against the validity of a nonnegotiable instrument, and which could only have been taken advantage of in this action by special demurrer.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by L. L. Haviland against the Southern California Edison Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. Ona Morton, Morton, Hollzer & Morton, Harry A. Hollzer, H. H. Trowbridge, F. M. Fowler, and Behymer, Craig & Salzman, all of Los Angeles (T. A. Williams, of Los Angeles, and Frank P. Deering, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. In this action, brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence, there was a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $15,000. The defendant appeals from the judgment. The grounds relied on for reversal appear in a bill of exceptions which was settled by the court below over the respondent's objection.

It is urged that the bill should not have been settled, and that it cannot be considered on this appeal. This contention, if sustained, would necessarily lead to an affirmance without any examination of the substantial merits of the attempted appeal.

The relevant facts connected with the presentation and settlement of the bill of exceptions may be briefly stated as follows:

The verdict of the jury was returned on July 1, 1912, and judgment entered on the following day. Notice of the entry of judgment was served on the defendant on the 2d day of July, 1912. On July 15, 1912, the defendant served on plaintiff its notice of intention to move for a new trial, stating therein that the motion would be made upon a bill of exceptions to be prepared. A proposed bill was served on August 24, 1912, a date which, so far as appears, would have been within the time allowed by law, stipulation, and order, if the notice of intention to move for a new trial had been properly served. But on July 15th, when such notice was served, the time for serving it had expired. Code Civ. Proc. § 659.

[1] On October 8, 1912, the defendant served on plaintiff a notice that it would, on October 14th, apply to the court for an order relieving it from its default in failing to serve notice of its intention to move for a new trial within the time allowed by law. The motion having been made, the court denied it, as it was bound to do, in view of the settled rule that there is no authority to grant relief from the consequences of a failure to initiate a proceeding for a new trial within the time limited by statute. Union Coll. Co. v. Oliver, 162 Cal. 755, 124 Pac. 435.

Thereafter, on November 18, 1912, the defendant served upon plaintiff a draft of its proposed bill of exceptions, embodying the proceedings at the trial. A similar bill had, as above stated, already been served. On November 20th, plaintiff served a notice stating that he objected to the settlement of the bill, and would move the judge to refuse to settle it, on the ground that it had been served too late. The defendant served a counter notice that it would apply to the court to be relieved from its default in thus delaying service of its proposed bill, specifying, as the grounds for such relief, its mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. The two motions came on for hearing together, and the court made its order granting the relief sought by the defendant, and settling and allowing the bill of exceptions. The respondent attacks the propriety of this order.

[2-4] The attempted showing of inadvertence and excusable neglect was contained in the affidavits of two members of the firm of attorneys representing the defendant. In effect, these affidavits declared that, when notice of the entry of judgment was served on July 2, 1912, the senior member of the firm, who received the notice, gave it to a junior for entry in the journal in which said firm kept a record of pending proceedings. By mistake, the junior, in undertaking to note the last day for serving notice of intention to move for a new trial, made his entry under date of August 12th, instead of July 12th. The error was not discovered until July 13th. The time for giving the notice had then expired. The affidavits also state that it was the practice of appellant's counsel, when they desired to review a judgment, to move for a new trial, and, if such motion was denied, to appeal from both the judgment and the order of denial, taking up both appeals on a single transcript embodying the bill of exceptions or statement used on the motion for new trial. Such bill or statement could, under the law in force at the time of the proceedings under review, have been used on appeal from the judgment, as well as on appeal from the order denying a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 950. And the right to use the bill of exceptions or statement in support of the appeal from the judgment existed, even though no appeal had been taken from the order denying a new trial. Vinson v. L. A. P. R. Co., 141 Cal. 151, 74 Pac. 757. If the court had had power to relieve the defendant from the consequences of the failure to make timely service of its notice of intention to move for a new trial, the showing made would unquestionably have warranted the granting of relief. It is not necessary to cite the many decisions in which this court has held that the power given by section 473 to relieve from defaults is to be liberally exercised with a view to bringing about a determination upon the merits. Orders granting relief are to be set aside only where there has been a manifest abuse of discretion. It will hardly be claimed that the inadvertent entry of a wrong date in the book or journal in which defendant's attorneys kept a record of the proceedings to be taken by them could not fairly have been held by the trial court to furnish sufficient ground for relief under the remedial provisions of section 473.

[5, 6] The respondent insists, however, that the inadvertence or excusable neglect upon which appellant relies had reference solely to the failure to serve a notice of intention to move for a new trial, and not to the service of a bill of exceptions. A bill of exceptions on appeal from the judgment could, of course, have been prepared without regard to the making of any motion for a new trial. Such statement or bill would, however, have had to be served within 10 days after the entry of the judgment, if the action was tried by a jury, or after the receipt of notice of entry, if the trial was without a jury. Code Civ. Proc. § 650. The appellant made no effort to serve a bill within this time, and does not claim that it intended so to do. The only bill sought to be prepared was one served, under section 659, within 10 days (or such further time as was given by order or stipulation) after service of notice of intention to move for a new trial. But since no valid notice of intention to thus move was ever given, it is argued that the bill of exceptions was not one designed to be used on appeal from the judgment without any motion for a new trial. If there was a default which could be excused, it was a default in serving notice of intention to move for a new trial and in serving a bill for use on such motion—not a default in serving a bill to be used on appeal from the judgment alone. But we think this argument rests upon too narrow a view. The affidavits justified the inference that the defendant intended, at all times, to appeal from the judgment, as well as from any order which might be made, denying a new trial, and that its purpose was to make up a record upon which both the judgment and the order might be reviewed. In consequence of the erroneous entry in the journal, the defendant incurred a default affecting its right to prepare a bill of exceptions, in addition to its right to move for a new trial. It had in mind a bill of exceptions which should serve a double purpose. The bill was to supply a record of the proceedings at the trial. Such record was to be used in asking the court below for a new trial, and also in seeking a review of the judgment on appeal. The fact that it could not be used for one of these purposes is no ground for saying that the defendant did not intend to use it for the other. While the court cannot relieve from a failure to make timely service of notice of intention to move for a new trial, it may relieve from the effect of delay in serving a bill of exceptions. Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 Pac. 332. Although the intended motion for a new trial had finally lapsed, the incidental proceeding for the settlement of a bill, available on appeal from the judgment, was still capable of resuscitation. The defendant was attempting the preparation of a record which was to be used for other purposes than the motion for a new trial. We see no reason why it might not be relieved, in so far as its mistake caused delay in the preparation of a bill of exceptions to be used on appeal from the judgment.

Concluding therefore that the court acted properly in settling the bill of exceptions, we come to a consideration of the appeal on its merits. The defendant was a corporation engaged in generating and distributing electric current. The plaintiff was a lineman in its employ. On the 24th day of June, 1911, he was engaged in work on one of defendant's poles. He came in contact with a high power wire and received a shock, in consequence of which he fell from the pole and received severe injuries. There is no occasion to go into a more detailed recital of the facts of the occurrence. Suffice it to say that we are satisfied that there was sufficient evidence to justify the jury in finding that the defendant had been guilty of negligence, that the plaintiff himself had not contributed to his injury by his own negligence, and that the injuries were not embraced within the risks assumed by him as a part of his employment.

But the defendant set up in its answer a further defense. It alleged that on the 14th day of July, 1911, the plaintiff, for a valuable consideration, agreed to and did settle for and forever release and discharge the defendant from all claims and liabilities arising out of any injury or loss sustained by him in consequence of the injury described in the complaint. It appears that on July 14th, a little less than three weeks after the accident, one Houston, an employé of the defendant, visited the plaintiff who was then undergoing treatment at a hospital. Houston presented to Haviland for signature a paper reading as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., July 14, 1911.

"Received of the Southern California Edison Company the sum of forty-two and ⁰⁰/₁₀₀ dollars, $42.00 in full release and discharge from any and all actions or causes of action, claims, demands and liability of every kind and nature whatsoever, for, upon, on account of, or by reason of any damage, loss, injury or liability sustained or which may be sustained by me in consequence of injuries received by me on or about 4:30 p. m. on June 24th, 1911, at 35th & Hope streets, Los Angeles, California. It is hereby expressly agreed and understood that the payment of said sum is not, and is not to be construed as, an admission on the part of said, the Southern California Edison Company of any liability whatsoever in consequence of said injuries, or accident."

At the same time he tendered him the sum of $42 mentioned in the paper. Plaintiff did not sign the paper at this time, but retained it in his possession for three or four days, after which he again met Houston and had some further talk with him. At this time Haviland signed the paper and gave it to Houston, receiving the $42.

That the paper on its face purports to release the defendant from all liability on account of the cause of action here sued upon cannot be, and indeed is not, questioned. The plaintiff sought to avoid the effect of the writing by claiming that he had been induced to sign it by the fraud of Houston. Haviland testified that at the first interview with Houston the latter had stated that the paper was "a form that the company used in case of accident" in order that the injured man might be placed on the pay roll, and that the plaintiff, would have to sign that form in order to be placed on the pay roll. The plaintiff's wife, who was present at this interview, gave testimony which in substance corroborated that of plaintiff, stating also that Houston had said that if Haviland signed the paper he would be taken care of and get his wages until he was able to go back to work. At the second interview Haviland and Houston were alone. On this occasion, as Haviland testified, Houston again said that the paper was a mere matter of form which he had to sign in order to be placed on the pay roll, and that if he did sign it he would receive $42 on account of wages for July (he had not been working during that month), and would be kept on the pay roll until able to work. Houston also, according to Haviland's testimony, said that the paper was in no way binding. Haviland thereupon signed the paper, and received $42. Prior to the accident, the plaintiff had been receiving wages of $3.50 per day. He was paid at this rate for July, August, September, October, November, and December, 1911, and for January, 1912. As he had done no work since the date of his injury, no part of the money received by him was due as wages. Early in February, 1912, he instituted this action. In addition to what has already been stated, Haviland testified that he was familiar with the words used in the release and knew their meaning in the English language, that he read the paper before he signed it, and that it contained no word or phrase of which he did not know the meaning. It is not claimed that when he had the interviews with Houston and when he signed the paper he was not in full possession of his faculties.

The sum total of the showing made by plaintiff is that, while he signed the release with full knowledge of its contents, and accepted and retained the consideration, he believed the statements of the defendant's agent that it was not binding, but was a mere matter of form and must be signed in order to get him on the pay roll. Houston, it may be said, denied that he made any such statements.

[7, 8] Assuming that these representations were made by Houston, their making did not constitute fraud in the legal sense. They were not statements of fact but at most misrepresentations of law. It is well settled that such misrepresentations, at least where there is no relation of trust or confidence between the parties, do not amount to fraud and will not furnish a ground for the rescission of a contract. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) p. 54; Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45, 23 L. Ed. 203; Champion v. Woods, 79 Cal. 17, 21 Pac. 534, 55 Am. St. Rep. 508, note. Whether the true ground for the rule be that everyone is presumed (or rather, bound) to know the law, or that a representation regarding the law constitutes an expression of opinion upon which the party to whom it is addressed has no right to rely, the rule itself is thoroughly well settled. It has frequently been applied to cases involving attempts to escape the effect of releases like the one here involved. Denver, etc., Co. v. Sullivan, 21 Colo. 302, 41 Pac. 501; Gipe v. Pittsburg, etc., Ry. Co., 41 Ind. App. 156, 82 N. E. 471; Jossey v. Ga. S. & F. Ry. Co., 109 Ga. 439, 34 S. E. 664; Wallace v. Railway Co., 67 Iowa, 547, 25 N. W. 772; Pioneer T. & T. Co. v. Grider, 34 Okl. 206, 124 Pac. 949.

The cases cited by the respondent do not conflict with these views. None of them presented a set of facts at all like that before us. In Smith v. O. & O. Steamship Co., 99 Cal. 462, 34 Pac. 84, it appeared that the plaintiff had not read the instrument by which it was sought to bind him, and, in fact, that he was not able to read it. In Meyer v. Haas, 126 Cal. 560, 58 Pac. 1042, the plaintiff was unfamiliar with the English language and signed a release upon representations made by an agent of the defendant, who at the same time occupied a fiduciary relation toward the plaintiff. In Davis v. Diamond C. & L. Co., 146 Cal. 59, 79 Pac. 596, the paper signed was a mere "receipt in full of all demands" and did not contain the definite and specific words of release found in the instrument here under consideration. It was properly held that evidence was admissible to show that such a general receipt was intended to cover only a certain matter under negotiation between the parties. Edmunds v. S. P. Co., 18 Cal. App. 532, 123 Pac. 811, was a case in which a release was set aside on the ground that the plaintiff, at the time he signed it, was in such a weak mental condition that he was unable to comprehend the effect of his act. But no case is cited, and we have found none, which decides that where a party in full possession of his faculties signs an instrument which he has read and considered, and whose terms and provisions he understands, he may avoid the effect of his act by producing evidence that the adverse party told him that the instrument was not binding.

The court below instructed the jury as follows:

"If you shall find from the evidence that the defendant, through its agent, fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that the writing filed in evidence here, called a release, would not be binding, and would be of no effect and was only to be used for the purpose of getting the plaintiff upon its pay roll, and that the plaintiff relied upon such representations, then I instruct you that such representation would be a fraud, and, if you find from the evidence that this writing called a release was executed under these circumstances, you will disregard the same."

That this instruction was erroneous is a conclusion that follows inevitably from what we have said.

[9] There is no force in the contention that plaintiff was entitled to avoid the release on the ground of mistake. It is true that, by our Civil Code (sections 1576, 1578), mistake of law is, under certain conditions, made a ground for relief equally with mistake of fact. Clearly there was, in this case, no mistake of fact; and we think the facts shown cannot be held to amount to proof of mistake of law. The plaintiff knew that he was signing a paper which, by its plain terms, released the defendant from liability. He was under no misapprehension regarding its language or its meaning. His claim is that he was deceived into the belief that the paper was not binding, or, in other words, that it did not mean what it said. If evidence to this effect could be regarded as sufficient to establish a mistake of law, there would be little binding force in written agreements, knowingly and voluntarily executed by competent parties in full possession of the facts.

The judgment is reversed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by F. A. Cox against the Palos Verdes Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Dismissed.

W. A. Martin, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Wm. Chambers and Carter, Kirby & Henderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Motion to dismiss appeal from the judgment for failure to file transcript within the time prescribed by the rules of this court.

The appeal herein was taken July 23, 1915, and the time for filing a transcript has long since expired, unless there is pending in the superior court a proceeding for the settlement of a bill of exceptions or statement which may be used in support of the appeal. Rule 2 (131 Pac. ix). The certificate of the clerk of said court on which the motion is based does not show the fact in regard to this, but said certificate, when taken in connection with certain affidavits filed by appellant, fairly shows all material facts.

The judgment was entered June 2, 1915, and notice of entry was served on appellant on June 3, 1915. Notice of intention to move for a new trial was not filed until June 15, 1915, which admittedly was too late, and the notice was therefore ineffectual for any purpose. On August 9, 1915, the motion for a new trial was dismissed. The notice of motion for new trial specified that the motion would be based on a statement on motion for a new trial. No proposed statement was served until July 24, 1915. The judge had on June 24, 1915, made an order granting appellant "30 days in addition to the time allowed by law within which to serve his proposed statement on motion for a new trial, if motion has been properly made, or relief granted by the court as to any defect now existing." Reserving all objections to the settlement of the statement, respondents served proposed amendments thereto, and on August 14, 1915, the proposed statement and proposed amendments were delivered by appellant to the clerk of the court for the judge. They have ever since been on the files of the court and were not called to the attention of the judge until after the giving and filing of notice of this motion to dismiss, March, 30, 1916. The trial judge has made no formal disposition of the matter of the settlement of such statement. The trial court has made no order relieving appellant from the effect of any default in the matter, and it is not claimed that any application for any such relief has ever been made.

The question then is whether, in view of these facts, a proceeding for the settlement of a statement that may be used on the appeal from the judgment is "pending" in the superior court within the meaning of our rule. We think it clear that it must be held that no such proceeding is now pending or has been pending at any time since December 14, 1915, even if pending before said date. If appellant's notice of intention to move for a new trial had been served and filed in time, he would have been entitled to serve his proposed statement on motion for a new trial, which could also have been used on his appeal from the judgment (Haviland v. Southern California Edison Co. [L. A. No. 3428], 158 Pac. 328), within 10 days after the service of his notice of intention to move for a new trial, which, it may be conceded, would have given him to June 24, 1915, and the order of the judge extending his time 30 days, made June 24, 1915, would have been in time and would have given him until July 24th, on which day the proposed statement was served. But the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not served in time and was ineffectual for any purpose, with the result that his time to serve a proposed bill of exceptions or statement that could be used on the appeal from the judgment commenced to run June 3d, and expired June 14, 1915 (the 13th being a Sunday), prior to the making of the order of June 24th. That order, too, it appears, was a conditional one, granting an extension in the event the "motion has been properly made," and, in view of the fact that the proceeding on motion for new trial was not instituted in time, in fact gave no additional time. The trial court had power to relieve appellant from his default in the matter of serving the proposed bill of exceptions or statement, and the same in that event could have been used on the appeal from the judgment (Haviland v. So. Cal. Ed. Co., supra), but could grant such relief only in the event that application was made therefor within six months from the default (section 473, Code Civ. Proc.); that is, within six months from June 14, 1915. It must be taken as a fact that no such application was made. Learned counsel for appellant is in error in his assumption that his claim for relief in such a case would arise only on the refusal of the judge to settle his statement. Relief from his default in the matter of presenting his proposed statement, from his failure to present it in time, is the relief essential to the settlement (Cole v. Wilcox, 99 Cal. 551, 34 Pac. 114; Cameron v. Arcata, etc., Co., 129 Cal. 282, 61 Pac. 955; Baily v. Kreutzmann, 141 Cal. 520, 75 Pac. 104), and this failure or default occurred on June 14, 1915. Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 Pac. 332, does not hold to the contrary in this regard. If there be anything in the opinion susceptible of such construction, it must be considered as overruled. Since December 14, 1915, therefore, notwithstanding the absence of any formal order dismissing the proceeding for a statement or refusing to settle it, there cannot fairly be said to have been any proceeding for the settlement "pending" in the lower court. The very best that can be contended for appellant in this connection is that he had such a proceeding, but that it lapsed on December 14, 1915, with the power of the court to grant him relief from his default in failing to serve his proposed statement in time. The transcript on appeal not having been filed within 40 days thereafter, the motion to dismiss is well based. We do not desire to be understood as holding that appellant can be said ever to have had a proceeding "pending" for the settlement of a statement, in view of his failure to serve any proposed statement within time, and the absence of any application for relief from his default. But we have assumed the fact in his favor for the purposes of the decision.

The appeal is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandate by R. W. Pridham and others against Walter A. Lewis, Auditor of Los Angeles County. From a judgment for defendant, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

William H. Fuller, of Los Angeles, for appellants. A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Robert B. Murphy, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by petitioners from a judgment of the lower court denying them a writ of mandate requiring respondent, as auditor of Los Angeles county, to issue warrants in their favor upon the county treasurer for additional salary claimed by petitioners as members of the board of supervisors of said county.

It appears that the petitioners Pridham, Norton, and Hinshaw were at the general election held in November, 1912, elected members of the board of supervisors of said county for terms expiring in January, 1917, and petitioners Manning and Butler were elected in November, 1910, to like offices for terms expiring in January, 1915. In March, 1914, Butler resigned, and petitioner Woodley was appointed to fill the office for the unexpired term.

At the November election of 1912 the electors of Los Angeles county, for the purpose of local government, adopted a charter, approved and ratified by the Legislature on January 29, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1486), section 4 of which is as follows:

"The county of Los Angeles shall have a board of supervisors consisting of five members, each of whom must be an elector of the district which he represents, must reside therein during his incumbency, must have been such an elector for at least one year immediately preceding his election, and shall be elected by such district. Their terms of office shall be four years, each shall hold until his successor is elected and qualified, and they shall each receive a salary of $5,000 per year payable monthly from the county treasury. They shall devote all their time during business hours to the faithful service of the public."

By section 57 thereof it was provided that said charter should "take effect at noon on the first Monday in June, 1913."

[1] The contention of petitioners is that, notwithstanding the fact that at the time when they were elected the general law fixed their salaries at $3,000 per year, they, by virtue of the provision contained in section 4 of said charter, are entitled to compensation for the balance of their terms at the rate of $5,000 per annum from the time when the charter became effective, June 2, 1913. If section 4, as to salaries, was the only provision contained in the charter touching the subject, petitioners might with some appearance of reason justify their contention. The section, however, must be read and construed with section 56, which is as follows:

"Nothing in this charter is intended to affect, or shall be construed as affecting, the tenure of office of any of the elective officers of the county or of any district, township or division thereof, in office at the time this charter goes into effect, and such officers shall continue to hold their respective offices until the expiration of the term for which they shall have been elected unless sooner removed in the manner provided by law; nor shall anything in this charter be construed as changing or affecting the compensation of any such officer during the term for which he shall have been elected."

As thus limited in effect, section 4, when applied to petitioners, does not purport to fix their salaries at $5,000 per year, but expressly disclaims any intent so to do. It would be difficult to find language more clearly expressing the obvious intent of the framers of the charter, namely, that section 4 shall not be "construed as changing or affecting the compensation of any such officer (petitioners) during the term for which he shall have been elected."

The case of Los Angeles County v. Ham- mel, 26 Cal. App. 580, 147 Pac. 983, involved a question almost identical with that here considered, and it was there held that, notwithstanding the provisions of section 15 of the charter, which required all officers to pay into the county treasury all fees collected by them, the sheriff elected before the charter went into effect was nevertheless, by virtue of the limitation contained in section 56, entitled to retain for his own use and as part of his compensation the fees collected by him, since the general law in effect when he was elected so provided. We regard what was there said as determinative of the question here presented. Here, as in that case, we are asked "to adopt one of the express provisions of the charter and make it effective, and discard altogether another plain provision which places a clear limitation upon the effect of the former." In that case we said:

"It was altogether within the power of the people in adopting the charter to provide for the compensation to be paid to the officers of the county, and as an incident thereto, it certainly would be within the scope of that power to provide as to when the diminished (or increased) compensation, if any, provided to be paid should commence."

In answer to appellants' contention that their "compensation is $5,000 per annum or nothing," we may suggest that, since the charter in express terms prohibits a construction of any provision thereof the effect of which would be to change the compensation of such officers during the term for which they were elected, the compensation fixed by general law, and none other, must be deemed the salary to which petitioners are entitled.

The fact, as contended by counsel for appellants, that under the charter the board of supervisors is authorized to fix the salary of the sheriff, while here the salary of the board of supervisors is fixed in the charter itself, does not change the meaning and effect of section 56 in limiting and fixing the time when the provision as to salaries contained in section 4 shall become operative. The intention, clearly and unequivocally expressed, was that all elective county officers whose terms commenced before the charter went into effect should during such terms continue to draw the salaries which attached to such offices under the general laws of the state.

The cases of Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 69, 82 Pac. 674, and Kingsbury v. Nye, 9 Cal. App. 574, 99 Pac. 985, cited by appellants, have no application to the case at bar. They are authorities in support of the proposition that section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution, to the effect that the compensation of an officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office, is directed to the Legislature and not to the people, who are the source of all power. Such, however, is not the question here involved.

[2] What has been said with reference to the members of the board elected is likewise applicable to Woodley, who, after the charter went into effect, was appointed to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Butler. Storke v. Goux, 129 Cal. 526, 62 Pac. 68; Larew v. Newman, 81 Cal. 588, 23 Pac. 227.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Norman H. Matson was convicted of libel, and from orders denying his motion in arrest of judgment and motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and orders affirmed.

Nathan C. Cogblan and Edwin V. McKenzie, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from judgment of conviction of libel, and from orders denying motion in arrest of judgment and motion for a new trial.

[1] The libel for which the defendant in this case was convicted consisted practically of three separate statements contained in an article published in a newspaper, the first of which charged specifically and positively that one James P. Arnold, the prosecuting witness—and who was the chief of police of the city of Richmond—had been receiving $10 per week from one Jean Martin, a prostitute; the second was to the effect that Jean Martin had said that she had paid $10 a week to Arnold for police protection; and the third was that said

Arnold had attempted to sell to Jean Martin for the sum of $10,000 a lot in the city of Richmond which was of the value of $700 only, and also that he had been in the habit of visiting gambling houses. We are satisfied that there is a substantial conflict in the evidence concerning what Jean Martin may have said in regard to the payment of $10 a week to Arnold; and we are also satisfied that there is evidence in the record sustaining the finding of the jury, implied from their verdict, that Jean Martin did not pay $10 a week to Arnold. True, that finding is based on the testimony of Arnold and of Jean Martin, but it is testimony standing in the record which the jury was entitled to believe if they saw fit under the instructions of the court; and if they believed it, it is sufficient to support the verdict.

[2] The conflict in the evidence on the other phase of the case practically takes the matter out of the hands of this court, because in the presence of such conflict we will not interfere with the conclusion reached by the jury.

[3] With reference to the alleged misconduct of the district attorney, while the district attorney should not have made the argument as contained in the record, nevertheless we are not satisfied that it was of such a grievous character as to influence the verdict, or that it contributed in any material degree thereto.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡1171(3)—HARMLESS ERROR—ARGUMENT.

In a prosecution for robbery, where it was a fact known to the jury that defendant's wife, who was a witness for him, was jointly charged with him, though it did not clearly appear that she was then under arrest and out on bail, the district attorney's remark that the jury should consider her interest in the case, keeping in mind that she was under arrest and out on bail, was not prejudicial.

2. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡865(1)—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF COURT—COERCION OF VERDICT.

The trial judge, after the jury had been out several hours, had them brought into court, inquired how they stood, and learned that, in the opinion of some jurors, no verdict was likely to be reached, and, upon inquiry by the foreman as to how the court would regard a recommendation for probation and an intimation that if the jury thought the court would be satisfied by such a recommendation, a verdict would probably be reached, said that all the jury had to do was to find a verdict, and that after verdict the court could not promise to follow any recommendation. Held, in view of the verdict of guilty, requesting that defendant be placed on probation and the court's pains to learn that the jury understood that their recommendation was not binding on it, that the court's action did not amount to coercing the jury into finding a verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Frank B. Ogden, Judge.

William L. Cherry was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

B. J. Wyman, Geo. J. McDonough, Rose & Silverstein, and A. C. Cunah, all of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in the court below and appellant herein was tried and convicted on a charge of robbery. On the 29th day of June, 1915, the prosecuting witness, Herman Hirsch, met Mrs. Hazel Cherry, the wife of the appellant herein, in the city of Oakland, who invited him to visit her home. A few days thereafter the defendant did so, and after being there a short time was induced by Mrs. Cherry to enter her bedroom. Mrs. Cherry seated herself upon the bed, and upon her invitation Hirsch did likewise, when almost immediately the defendant rushed in, revolver in hand, and, after threatening to send Hirsch "over the road for ten years," took from him a watch and $100. The defendant, however, almost immediately returned the watch, and then ordered Hirsch to leave the house.

[1] At the trial the defendant's wife was a witness in his behalf, and upon the argument of the cause to the jury the district attorney, during the course of his remarks, said:

"Take into consideration the interest which the defendant's wife has in this case, keeping in mind all the time that she is under arrest at the present time and out on bail."

Counsel for the defendant concedes that the jury must have known that the defendant's wife was jointly charged with him in the crime for which the defendant was on trial; the evidence in the record shows that she was a party thereto; and while it may not show that she was at the time of the trial under arrest and out on bail, still we are unable to perceive how the comment of the prosecuting officer could have prejudicially affected the rights of the defendant.

[2] One of the contentions of the appellant is that the trial judge coerced the jury into finding a verdict. This point has no more merit than the one just discussed. After the jury had been deliberating upon their verdict during several hours, the judge caused them to be brought into court, and upon inquiry learned how they stood numerically, and that in the opinion of some members of the jury no verdict in all probability would be reached. Before again retiring, the foreman of the jury apparently attempted to learn how the court would regard a recommendation for probation, intimating that if the jury were satisfied that the court would be governed by such a recommendation, a verdict in all probability would be quickly reached, whereupon the court stated:

"All you have to do is to find a verdict; you take the law as given you by the court, and apply the facts of the case to the law; and after you have reached a conclusion, while the court would be glad of any recommendation which you have to make, the court could not promise you that it would follow your recommendation. * * * If you have arrived at a conclusion as to the facts, it is your duty, irrespective of what punishment would follow, to find the facts and report them to the court."

Ultimately the jury brought in a verdict of guilty of robbery, requesting the court to place the defendant on probation. Upon the reading of the verdict and recommendation, the court provoked a colloquy, during which for a time it looked very much as if some of the jurors would say that they had voted for a verdict of guilty, believing and understanding that the court would be bound by their recommendation as to probation; but nothing the court had said justified any such understanding; and before finally dismissing the jury he took pains to learn that they understood and intended that the recommendation attached to their verdict carried no binding force on the court.

[3] In this same connection, viz., the appellant's contention that the jury were coerced into their verdict, it is true that the court did, in urging the jury to reach a verdict, refer to the time consumed in the trial and the large expense incurred therein; but there is nothing in the record which warrants the assertion that the jury were unduly urged or at all coerced into rendering their verdict against the defendant. The court said nothing to indicate what the verdict should be. Its remarks were fair and guarded, and were made for the commendable purpose of having the jury labor honestly and faithfully to arrive at a verdict if possible, and thus terminate the litigation. This did not constitute error.

The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

J. T. Waugh was convicted of robbery, and from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

J. T. Reed and E. P. Sample, both of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery. From the judgment pronounced against him and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial he prosecutes this appeal.

Assignments of error are predicated upon the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, the refusal of the court to give certain instructions requested by defendant, and alleged misconduct of the district attorney in referring to defendant's failure to testify in his own behalf.

[1] As to the first contention, the extent of appellant's argument in support thereof is the mere assertion that—

"there is no evidence in the record that proves, or tends to prove, by direct testimony, substantial evidence, or otherwise, that the defendant and appellant was in the vicinity or near the place of the alleged robbery."

The victim of the robbery was Elizabeth Sarah Rae, who, in company with another, about midnight on July 31, 1915, was traveling in an automobile along the strand from Coronado to the mainland, when they were intercepted by two men, who compelled them to get out of the car, at which time certain diamonds and jewelry in the possession of Mrs. Rae were forcibly taken from her. While there was no direct evidence identifying defendant as one of the participants in the crime, much circumstantial evidence was adduced, which, together with the unexplained possession by defendant of the stolen goods near the place where the crime was committed and shortly thereafter, clearly tended to connect him with the robbery and justified the jury in reaching a verdict that he was guilty as charged; indeed, as stated, counsel for appellant does not otherwise seriously contend.

[2] Defendant requested the court to instruct the jury in substance that if they believed from the evidence that defendant had in the past been leading a wild and immoral life and had been guilty of acts which they deemed to be immoral or unlawful, or had an unsavory reputation, such facts should not be considered by them in determining the question of defendant's guilt or innocence of the crime charged, but that the same degree of proof was required to establish his guilt as that required to establish the guilt of any other person charged with a similar offense. The court refused to give such instructions, and the ruling is assigned as error. No issue was made as to the past life, character, or reputation of defendant, and no evidence was offered touching the subject. True, a witness called on behalf of the people, when testifying to his association with defendant in Tia Juana, Mexico, incidentally referred to the fact that they went out together and hunted for some opium, and on cross-examination he stated that defendant informed him that the opium had been hidden near Tia Juana Hot Springs, and which, if found, he could sell to a Chinaman at Tia Juana; but this in no wise justified the giving of such instructions. Moreover, under the instructions given by the court, clearly stating to the jury the facts which they were to consider in arriving at a verdict, and conceding the requested instructions proper, it is inconceivable that the failure to give them could in any wise have influenced the jury in its consideration of the case, or affected the substantial rights of defendant.

[3, 4] The contention that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during his argument, in referring to the fact that defendant had not testified in his own behalf is without merit and groundless. It is based upon a statement, made by the district attorney and justified by the record, that defendant's possession of the stolen jewelry shortly after the robbery was unexplained by any sworn testimony. It is fundamental that, since a defendant may not be compelled to be a witness against himself (section 1323, Pen. Code), a prosecuting officer may not comment adversely upon his failure to take the witness stand in his own behalf. We agree with the trial judge, however, that in making the statement attributed to him the district attorney did not infringe upon the rights so guaranteed defendant. Surely, if no explanation was offered on behalf of defendant as to his possession of the stolen goods, it would be competent for counsel representing the people to refer to the want of such explanation, since such possession unexplained was a material circumstance affecting his guilt or innocence. The action of the district attorney in commenting upon the failure of the defense to account for defendant's possession of the stolen property was not indicative of a purpose on the part of such official to use against defendant the fact that he did not take the stand in his own behalf. People v. Fitts, 4 Cal. App. 436, 91 Pac. 536.

We find no prejudicial error disclosed by the record, and the judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Manuel Ponchette was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from the judgment and order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Dorn & Parker and A. L. Dorn, all of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The alleged killing occurred in the city of San Diego on the night of June 15, 1915, at which time one John Douglas was fatally shot. No testimony was tendered by any one who witnessed the shooting; the evidence connecting defendant with the crime being largely of a circumstantial nature. Its character, however, is such that, when considered in connection with statements proven to have been made by defendant, to the effect that he shot and robbed the deceased of a sum of money; it was well calculated to leave little doubt in the minds of the jurors that defendant committed the crime with which he was charged.

[1, 2] The first error assigned relates to the action of the court in refusing a continuance of the trial upon application of defendant. The record shows that the cause was set down for trial on December 7, 1915. About 4 o'clock p. m. of said day, and after a jury had been impaneled to try the case, defendant applied to the court for a postponement of the trial upon the ground of the absence of Ben Eronas, a witness for whom a subpoena had been issued on November 26th, but not served. Defendant's affidavit was offered in support of the application, from which it appeared that Eronas, as defendant was informed and believed, had gone to Imperial county, that Eronas, if present, would testify that defendant spent the night upon which the crime was committed, to wit, June 15, 1915, at the house of said Eronas, in the town of Escondido, distant some 30 or 40 miles from San Diego, and that said fact could not be proved by any other witness. It was further averred by defendant that, if the trial was continued one month, affiant believed that he could have said witness present to testify as aforesaid. Section 1052 of the Penal Code provides that:

"When an action is called for trial, or at any time previous thereto, the court may, upon sufficient cause, direct the trial to be postponed to another day."

The application for continuance, however, was not made when the case was called for trial, as provided in this section, but, as shown by the record, made after the jury had been impaneled and the trial had proceeded, presumably for a day. Not only so, but it further appears from the record that de-defendant, notwithstanding his affidavit, did produce other witnesses who testified that defendant was in Escondido on the night the homicide occurred, and the testimony, had it been produced, would have been cumulative in nature. Hawley v. Los Angeles Creamery Co., 16 Cal. App. 50, 116 Pac. 84. The granting or refusing a continuance in a criminal case is a matter largely in the discretion of the trial court, and it is only in cases where it is apparent that such discretion has not been wisely exercised that this court is justified in reversing such ruling. In view of the fact that the application was made after the trial had commenced and proceeded to the extent of impaneling a jury to try the defendant, together with the fact, as shown by the record, that defendant did produce the testimony of other witnesses who, had they been believed, would have established the alibi pleaded, it cannot be said there was any abuse of discretion in denying the application for a continuance, nor that defendant was prejudiced in his substantial rights by the ruling.

[3] During the examination of defendant, who offered himself as a witness, he testified as to his age. Thereafter witnesses Lopez and Blair were called as witnesses on behalf of the state, who, over defendant's objection, were permitted to testify as to previous statements made by defendant as to his age, which statements were inconsistent with his testimony. The theory of the people, and also of the court in making the ruling, was that such testimony was proper as tending to impeach the evidence given by defendant. At a later stage in the trial, however, the court suggested to defendant's attorney that, if he would move to strike out the evidence, the motion would be granted. The motion was made, and the evidence of these witnesses with reference to the statements so made by the defendant was stricken from the record, and the jury instructed to disregard such testimony. Conceding the first ruling of the court in admitting the testimony to have been erroneous, any prejudicial effect thereof was rendered harmless by the later action of the court.

[4] When the court instructed the jury it had before it several instructions which had been requested by defendant. Through inadvertence, however, these instructions, other than the first one so requested, were not at the time given the jury. Shortly after the jury had retired the court discovered the omission and had the jury recalled, when, addressing defendant's attorney, the court said: "I overlooked certain instructions. I will give them to the jury now, if you do not object, Mr. Ellis." To which defendant's attorney replied: "No; that is just in accordance with my wishes." Whereupon the court read to the jury the instructions requested by defendant, in so far as they had not there-before been given. It is inconceivable how such action could have been prejudicial to defendant's substantial rights; indeed, the recalling of the jury and giving them the instructions requested by defendant was favorable rather than otherwise, since it tended to emphasize the declarations of law therein contained.

"The court possesses an inherent power to cause the jury to be returned for further instructions, a power wisely employed whenever the judge becomes convinced that he has not made them fully to understand an appropriate proposition of law, or has omitted to state portions of the testimony proper to be stated." People v. Perry, 65 Cal. 568, 4 Pac. 572.

While defendant claimed to have been in another town some 30 or 40 miles from the place where the crime was committed on June 15, 1915, and produced testimony to show such fact, nevertheless it is apparent that the jury did not believe the same; and, since there was ample testimony, if they did not believe such witnesses, upon which to base its verdict, the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by John Lapique against Abraham Ruef and others. From an order for defendants, Le Breton and Oliver, sustaining their demurrers to the second amended complaint, and from a judgment entered thereon, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Lapique, of Orange, for appellant. Louis S. Beedy and De Laveaga & Dinkelspiel, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll from an order entered in favor of the defendants, Le Breton and Oliver, sustaining their respective demurrers to the plaintiff's second amended complaint, and from a judgment entered thereon. The demurrers assailed the complaint as a whole and the 20 alleged causes of action attempted to be pleaded therein, upon the ground, among others, of uncertainty and ambiguity.

[1, 2] The demurrers upon the grounds stated were well taken for the reason that it cannot be determined from the allegations of said second amended complaint whether plaintiff's causes of action were founded upon alleged injuries to his person, his property, or his character, or upon an injury to the property of one Jean Louis Ader. This complaint was ambiguous and uncertain in the further particular that it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether the acts complained of were committed by the defendants in their individual capacity, or in one of the other capacities in which they are alleged to have acted. The demurrers having been properly sustained upon the ground stated and in the particulars pointed out, it will not be necessary for us to discuss the other grounds of demurrer.

The judgment is affirmed.

FEDERAL CONST. CO. v. WOLD, Superintendent of Streets. (Civ. 1869.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 1, 1916.)

1. STATUTES $\hookrightarrow$ 64(4)—PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

Bond Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1441), providing that the municipality, in the absence of any other purchasers, must purchase all property offered at delinquent sales for the nonpayment of street assessments, etc., if violative of Const. art. 11, § 18, requiring any incurrence by a city of liability not to be satisfied during the current fiscal year to be supported by a two-thirds vote of the electorate, is void merely as to the provision requiring the municipality to purchase property offered at delinquent sales.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS $\hookrightarrow$ 867(2) — INDEBTEDNESS — CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATION.

Const. art. 11, § 18, refers only to acts or contracts of a municipality, and not to liabilities which the law places upon them, as for maintaining streets.

6. EVIDENCE $\hookrightarrow$ 5(2)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—MATTER OF COMMON KNOWLEDGE.

It is a matter of common knowledge that elevations in the part of California in which the city of Burlingame is situated are commonly referred to height above sea level.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 5(2).]

Application for writ of mandamus by the Federal Construction Company against Eric Wold, as Superintendent of Streets of the City of Burlingame. Peremptory writ directed to issue in conformity with the prayer of the petition.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, and Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, for petitioner. Heller, Powers & Ehrman and John F. Davis, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of mandate directed to the superintendent of streets of the city of Burlingame.

The petitioner is the contractor to whom was awarded the contract for the doing of certain street and other work in said city under the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, approved April 7, 1911), and the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, approved June 11, 1915). It is sought to obtain the order of this court that the respondent should enter into the contract with the petitioner for the doing of said work. The respondent has declined to sign said contract upon the ground, amongst others, that said bond act is unconstitutional, and upon the grounds of certain alleged irregularities in the proceedings leading up to the award of the contract.

[1, 2] With reference to the constitutional point, it appears that the Bond Act of 1915 provides that the municipality, in the absence of any other purchasers, must purchase all property offered at delinquent sales for the nonpayment of street assessments. It is contended that such a provision is in effect an incurring of liability not to be satisfied during the current fiscal year in which the same is incurred, and not supported by a two-thirds vote of the electorate, and hence violative of section 18, art. 11, of the state Constitution. This objection, if tenable, merely would render the provision requiring the municipality to purchase property offered at delinquent sales unconstitutional. It would not affect the validity of the balance of the act. However, it has been held that this section of the Constitution only refers to the acts or contracts of a municipality, and not to liabilities which the law places upon municipalities. Lewis v. Widber, 99 Cal. 412, 33 Pac. 1128; Welch v. Strother, 74 Cal. 413, 16 Pac. 22; Cashin v. Dunn, 58 Cal. 581.

[3] Furthermore, it appears that under section 11 of this so-called Bond Act of 1915 a municipality can escape the responsibility for the purchase of property by the action of its council in providing for the collection of delinquent assessments by foreclosure suits. The liability, therefore, is in effect contingent upon the future acts of the municipality, and would not be within the constitutional restriction.

[4] It is further contended that the resolution of intention was never published, for the reason that certain work is called for to be done upon a street named Cabrillo avenue under the original resolution of intention and the plans and specifications, whereas, as published, the resolution called for work to be done upon Drake avenue, a parallel street. The particular work in question, however, was of a very minor nature compared to the aggregate work called for, and it was otherwise properly described. In the resolution of intention the plans and specifications are referred to and made a part of the same, so that a property owner, upon examining the plans and specifications, original resolution of intention, and published resolution of intention, was fully informed of the work proposed to be done.

[5] A further ground of invalidity urged by the respondent is a defect in the notice given by the clerk of the city council inviting bids for doing the work. The statute provides that proposals shall be accompanied by a certified check or bond for an amount which shall not be less than 10 per cent. of the aggregate of the proposal. Improvement Act of 1911, § 10, Stats. 1911, p. 730. The resolution of the board of trustees conformed in all respects to the law; but the clerk, in the notice inviting proposals, called for a certified check in said amount, but failed to mention the alternative of a bond for said amount. The statute, however, does not require any recital in the clerk's notice with reference either to the certified check or bond. The act of the clerk was unauthorized, and therefore will be disregarded, and the notice which was authorized by the board of trustees be alone considered. Belser v. Allman, 134 Cal. 399, 402, 66 Pac. 492.

[6] It is also contended that no sufficient grades were established; but it appeared that proper resolutions fixing the grades had been passed, in which certain elevations were stated, which elevations were referred to a pin in the cement curb in front of the Bank of Burlingame building, the elevation of which is 32.293 feet. It is contended that this does not show whether or not said pin or reference point is above or below any established datum or base, and therefore is indefinite. It is a matter of common knowledge, however, that elevations in this part of the state are commonly referred to height above sea level; and any engineer would therefore be able to determine the proper elevations fixed by the resolutions passed by the board.

The other points urged by the respondent do not seem to be worthy of especial consideration.

A peremptory writ of mandate will therefore issue forthwith in conformity with the prayer of the petition on file.

STRAUSS v. MOWRY. (Civ. 1836.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 27, 1916.)

APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 1024(3) — REVIEW — CONCLUSION ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where the statements of plaintiff's affidavit, in opposition to defendant's motion for a change in the place of trial, touching defendant's place of residence, were sufficient to raise a substantial conflict on the question of defendant's residence, the conclusion of the trial court thereon will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3836, 3837; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1024(3).]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Arthur Strauss against George B. Mowry. From an order denying defendant's motion for a change of place of trial, he appeals. Order affirmed.

J. K. Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Isaac Frohman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by defendant from an order denying his motion for a change of the place of trial. The only question raised on the appeal is the sufficiency of the affidavit of the plaintiff touching the place of residence of the defendant, it being the contention of the appellant that the statements contained in said affidavit are based merely on hearsay, and consequently raised no conflict with the statements contained in the affidavit of the defendant. It is quite plain, however, from a perusal of the plaintiff's affidavit, that the statements referred to are positive in character, and not subject to the criticism of the appellant in the respect mentioned. They were sufficient to raise a substantial conflict on the question of the defendant's residence, in view of which the conclusion of the trial court will not be disturbed upon appeal.

The order is affirmed.

CONSOLIDATED MUSIC CO. v. MORRISON. (Civ. 1696.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 27, 1916.)

1. PLEADING $\hookrightarrow$ 205(2), 347—CONDITIONAL SALES—REMEDIES OF SELLER.

A complaint alleging that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of personalty held by defendant under conditional sale contract is sufficient against a general demurrer or a motion for judgment, although defendant's failure to make the stipulated payments is not specifically alleged.

2. PLEADING $\hookrightarrow$ 346—VERIFICATION—EFFECT OF OMISSION IN ANSWER.

An unverified answer to a verified complaint may be disregarded as sham upon the plaintiff's motion for judgment upon the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1060-1064; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 346.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by the Consolidated Music Company against Josephine Morrison. Judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James E. Colston, of San Francisco, for appellant. Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel and John R. Jones, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered and entered in favor of the plaintiff upon motion for judgment on the pleadings. The action was upon claim and delivery for the recovery of the possession of a certain musical instrument. The complaint was verified, and alleged that the defendant was in possession of such instrument under a contract of conditional sale; that the contract required installments to be paid thereon at certain specified times, and reserved title in the plaintiff until the purchase price thereof had thus been fully paid. The agreement is attached to the complaint. It is not specifically averred that the defendant is in default in making these payments, but the complaint does allege that the plaintiff is the owner and is entitled to the immediate possession of the property, and that the defendant, without any excuse or justification, withholds from the plaintiff the possession of the same after demand duly made.

To this verified complaint the defendant first filed a general unverified denial, and thereafter filed a specific, and also unverified, answer, denying the material averments of the complaint. The plaintiff thereupon moved for judgment on the pleadings upon the ground that the defendant's answer was sham, frivolous, and insufficient to constitute a defense to the action. The defendant responded to this motion with a counter-motion for judgment in her favor upon the pleadings upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court denied the defendant's motion, and granted the motion of the plaintiff, and thereupon gave judgment in its favor, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

[1] We are of the opinion that the complaint was sufficient as against a general demurrer or as against the defendant's motion for judgment on the general ground that it failed to state a cause of action. It is true that said complaint did not specifically aver a breach of her contract on the part of the defendant; but it did contain express averments of plaintiff's ownership and right to the possession of the property. This form of allegation was expressly approved in actions on claim and delivery in the case of Summerville v. Stockton Milling Co., 142 Cal. 529-547, 76 Pac. 243. At most, it may be said that the complaint was uncertain; and this objection could not be urged under the general ground of objection. The defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings was therefore properly denied.

[2] The defendant's answer to the plaintiff's verified complaint was unverified, and the court was for that reason entitled to disregard and treat it as sham upon the plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings. This it did; and in so doing committed no error either in its order granting such motion or in its judgment based upon a complaint which, as we have seen, stated facts sufficient as against a general demurrer to constitute a cause of action.

Judgment affirmed.

2. PARENT AND CHILD ¶17(6)—NONSUPPORT—OBLIGATION TO CONTRIBUTE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a prosecution for willfully omitting to support defendant's minor children, fact that during the period of time covered by the information the children were not in defendant's custody, because, in a divorce suit between defendant and his wife, the court had awarded their custody to the mother, made it necessary for the prosecution to show that defendant's obligation to contribute toward their support was not suspended under Civ. Code, § 196, declaring that the parent entitled to the custody of the child must support and educate him.

Punishment of a divorced husband, under Pen. CONREY, P. J. Appeal by the defendant from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Defendant was convicted of the offense described in section 270 of the Penal Code and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail of Los Angeles county for a term of three months. The charge was that the defendant, during a certain period of five months in the year 1915, willfully omitted to furnish necessary food, clothing, shelter, and medical attendance to his minor children named in the information. There are no briefs on file, and we shall confine our attention to the propositions urged on behalf of appellant at the oral argument.

PEOPLE v. CHAMPION. (Cr. 471.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 15, 1916.)

1. DIVORCE ¶289 — ORDER RELATING TO CHILDREN—AUTHORITY OF COURT—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 138, in an action for divorce the court has authority to make such or-

In January, 1915, in an action of divorce in the superior court of Los Angeles county wherein this defendant was defendant and the mother of said minor children was plaintiff, the court denied the plaintiff's petition for a divorce and decreed that the defendant as cross-complainant was entitled to a divorce from the plaintiff. The court, having further found that both parties were fit to have custody of the children, awarded the custody of them to the mother and, after making certain provisions concerning the property interests of the parties, ordered that the defendant pay $6 a week for the support of said minor children. Counsel for appellant, after directing our attention to these facts, contended that under the evidence in this case it appears that the order for payment of money by him was made by his consent upon a stipulation, and that to imprison him for failure to make payments in accordance with that decree is to imprison him for debt, which he contends would be a violation of defendant's constitutional rights.

[1, 2] The record clearly establishes that the decree and order in question derived their force entirely from the power of the court, and not from any contract or consent on the part of defendant. In an action for divorce the court has authority to make such order for the custody, care, education, maintenance, and support of the minor children as may seem necessary or proper. Civ. Code, § 138. The fact that during the period of time covered by the information in this case the children were not in the custody of their father made it necessary for the prosecution to show that his obligation to contribute toward the support of the children was not suspended, as he might have contended that it was under section 196 of the Civil Code, which declares that:

"The parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. * * *

For it has been held that where, in a divorce proceeding, the custody of a minor child is given to the mother and no provision in the decree is made for the support of such child by the father, the parent entitled to the custody of the child must support it. People v. Hartman, 23 Cal. App. 72, 79, 137 Pac. 611; Matter of McMullin, 164 Cal. 504, 129 Pac. 773. It has been held further, in a case arising under section 139 of the Civil Code, that that section empowers the courts in cases of divorce to compel a parent to support his children after being deprived of their custody. People v. Schlott, 162 Cal. 347, 122 Pac. 846. Section 139 declares the power of the court where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, to compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage. But it appears that under section 138 like power exists in all divorce cases and at all stages of the proceedings.

[3] We are satisfied that there is no ground for the contention that punishment of the defendant under section 270 of the Penal Code would conflict with his constitutional right to be exempt from imprisonment "for debt in any civil action" (Cal. Const. art. 1, § 16); for that would not even indirectly be the effect of the judgment. The record of the divorce case merely establishes the fact that the defendant's legal obligation as father of the children to contribute to their support has not been suspended or removed by the order removing them from his custody. Under these circumstances, he is liable to punishment upon a showing that he has willfully omitted without lawful excuse to furnish necessary food, etc., for their use.

[4] It is further contended that the evidence fails to show a willful omission by the defendant to make the necessary provision for the support of his children, and fails to show that they were not in fact sufficiently supported by their mother. Since there was evidence tending to support the accusation as to these matters, we find no sufficient reason for setting aside the verdict of the jury.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Harry Maupins was convicted of mayhem, and from the judgment and an order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. T. Roark, of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted upon an information filed August 11, 1915, charging him with the crime of mayhem. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The fact that the court refused to give certain instructions requested by defendant is assigned as prejudicial error. An examination of the oral charge made by the court to the jury discloses that the substance of these requested instructions was fully covered therein; hence there was no necessity for repetition. People v. Williams, 32 Cal. 280; People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151.

[2] Appellant, while conceding this proposition, nevertheless insists that where the refusal to give an instruction is based upon such ground it is incumbent upon the court to so state in the presence of the jury. This contention finds support in People v. Hurley, 8 Cal. 392, and People v. Williams, 17 Cal. 142, in the latter of which it is said:

"If the court refuses a proper instruction in a criminal case, it is no answer to the error assigned for this cause, that an equivalent one was before given, unless this reason be assigned at the time for the refusal."

We do not concede the doctrine thus enunciated in these early cases to constitute the law. Since the instructions refused are not read to the jury, no purpose could be subserved by requiring the court to state the ground for such refusal. In no event, however, could defendant be prejudiced by the failure of the court to state in the presence of the jury its reason for refusing to give an instruction requested. People v. Ramirez, 56 Cal. 533, 38 Am. Rep. 73.

[3] Error is also predicated upon a ruling of the court refusing to make an order granting defendant's request that the jury be permitted to view the premises where the offense was committed. Section 1119 of the Penal Code provides:

"When, in the opinion of the court, it is proper that the jury should view the place in which the offense is charged to have been committed, or in which any other material fact occurred, it may order the jury to be conducted in a body * * * to the place. * * *"

Upon this question, we repeat what was said by this court in the case of People v. Howard, 151 Pac. 754:

"It thus appears that the making of such order is a matter committed solely to the discretion of the court, and it is difficult to conceive of a case in which the facts would justify a reversal for an abuse of such discretion."

In People v. Fitzpatrick, 80 Cal. 541, 22 Pac. 216, it is said:

"Sending a jury out to view premises, even when clearly within section 1119 of the [Penal] Code, is a hazardous proceeding, and frequently leads to difficulties; and it would be well for trial courts not to make use of the power therein given except in cases which seem to imperatively call for it."

There is nothing in the record which discloses any abuse of discretion on the part of the court in making the order complained of.

[4] As stated, the information was filed on August 11, 1915. On October 19, 1915, more than 60 days after the filing of said information, defendant made a motion that the prosecution of defendant be dismissed upon the ground that more than 60 days had elapsed since the filing of the information charging him with the offense, which motion was denied. Section 1382 of the Penal Code provides;

"The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: * * * 2. If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information."

It appears that upon the filing of the information defendant was duly arraigned and his trial set for August 20, 1915; that on said last-mentioned date the court proceeded with the trial, which continued until August 24, 1915, at which time the jury, having been unable to agree upon a verdict, were discharged. Thereafter, on October 19, 1915, defendant was tried a second time and convicted. It thus appears that, within 60 days from the filing of the information, there was a mistrial, which, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, constitutes the "good cause" mentioned in the section quoted for the court's ruling. Ex parte Ross, 82 Cal. 109, 22 Pac. 1086; People v. Chadwick, 143 Cal. 116, 76 Pac. 884.

An examination of the alleged errors predicated upon the rulings of the court in admitting and refusing to admit testimony discloses no prejudicial error. Nor is there any merit in defendant's contention that his substantial rights were prejudiced by misconduct of the district attorney in commenting upon the testimony.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

3. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS — 6(8)—PRACTICING WITHOUT CERTIFICATE—"EMERGENCY SERVICES."

Where persons, treated by defendant in a prosecution for practicing a system of healing the sick without possessing a certificate issued by the state board of medical examiners, had previously had the attention of physicians, their ailments being more or less chronic, and defendant's services being sought to some extent as a last resort, and after other practitioners had failed to afford relief, the treatment so rendered could not be classed as emergency services not prohibited by medical act.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

J. B. Vermillion was convicted of having practiced a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted without a certificate issued by the state board of medical examiners entitling him to do so. From the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Clifford O. Pease and L. L. Burr, both of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Appellant was convicted of having practiced a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted without possessing a certificate issued by the state board of medical examiners entitling him so to do.

The Supreme Court of this state, in the cases of People v. Jordan (Sup.) 156 Pac. 451, and People v. Ratledge (Sup.) 156 Pac. 455, has decided adversely to appellant's contentions, as to the main questions raised upon this appeal, and upon the authority of those decisions the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial should be affirmed.

[1-3] The added contention not considered in the cases cited, to-wit, that appellant could not be properly convicted unless it were shown that he charged a fee for his services, we think must be decided against him. The statute under which the prosecution was had makes it unlawful for a person to practice any art of healing without having first obtained a certificate from the medical board, and we think the act is intended to, and does, cover such practice whether the service is gratuitous or not. However, it was shown in evidence by the defendant's own testimony that he had engaged in the practice of a healing art, styling himself a "chiropractic," for a period of five years immediately preceding the date of his arrest. It was shown that he maintained a regular office in a business building in the city of San Diego, and there was testimony showing that he had treated in a professional way three different patients who were suffering from bodily ills. There was evidence also that in one case payment was offered and accepted by him in return for the services rendered. Defendant admitted the receipt of this money, but declined to state whether he regularly made a charge for his services. The fair inference from all the testimony which we think the jury was entitled to draw was that he regularly practiced a healing art, and, furthermore, that he did so for remuneration. Some contention is made that the service which appellant rendered to persons described in the evidence was in the nature of emergency service not prohibited by the medical act. There was no evidence tending to show that the services were of an emergency character; that is, services rendered by way of affording temporary relief until the services of a regular practitioner could be procured. The persons who were thus treated were shown to have previously had the attention of physicians, and their ailments were more or less of a chronic sort, and that the services of appellant were sought, to some extent at least, as a last resort and after other practitioners had failed to afford relief. Treatment so rendered could not, in any sense, be classed under the head of "emergency service."

[4] The instructions given by the court we think properly stated the law, and that no error was committed in refusing to charge the jury, as appellant requested in certain offered instructions. It was not necessary, where the court refused instructions offered, for the reason that the same propositions had been sufficiently stated in the instructions given, to state such reason to the jury. See People v. Maupins (Crim. No. 457) 158 Pac. 502, decided by this court on the 5th day of May, 1916.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. OAKLEY. (Cr. 433.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 6, 1916.)

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS $\S$ 6(1)—PRACTICING WITHOUT CERTIFICATE—GRATUITOUS SERVICES.

A party who was a teacher and demonstrator of a chiropractic system of healing before a class in a chiropractic school, and treated afflicted subjects who sought and received treatment at his hands free of charge, was guilty nevertheless of practicing a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted without possessing a certificate of the state board of medical examiners.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

N. C. Oakley was convicted of having practiced a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted without possessing a certificate issued by the state board of medical examiners, entitling him to do so. From the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Clifford C. Pease, of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Appellant was convicted of having practiced a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted without possessing a certificate issued by the state board of medical examiners entitling him so to do. The facts in the case are substantially the same as those involved in that of People v. Vermillion (Crim. No. 420) 158 Pac. 504, an opinion in which was this day filed. While defendant's practice, as shown, was as a teacher and demonstrator of the chiropractic system before a class in a chiropractic school, the subjects of such demonstration being the sick and afflicted who at his hands sought and received treatment free of charge, such fact did not exempt him from the operation of the law. An examination of the record discloses no grounds possessing any merit other than those urged in the Vermillion case, supra, and in the cases of People v. Jordan (Sup.) 156 Pac. 451, and People v. Ratledge (Sup.) 156 Pac. 455, upon the authority of which the judgment and order appealed from must be and are affirmed.

NEW TRIAL $\S$ 131(5)—STATEMENT—PRESENTATION FOR SETTLEMENT — RELIEF FROM DEFAULT.

Where defendant's default in failing to present for settlement his proposed statement on a motion for new trial has continued more than six months after the time limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 650, for such presentation, the court, under section 473, has no jurisdiction, on a showing of excuse for the delay, to grant him relief, even as against plaintiff's motion to dismiss the motion for new trial, because of failure seasonably to make such presentation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 267; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 131(5).]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by W. S. Van Cott against Marshal A. Frank. From adverse orders, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel Rosenheim, of San Francisco (H. B. M. Miller, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Geo. F. Hatton and Hartley F. Peart, both of San Francisco (Gus L. Baraty, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. There are two appeals presented in this record—one from an order of the trial court dismissing the defendant's motion for a new trial, upon the ground that no bill of exceptions or statement of the case had been presented or settled; and the other from an order of the court refusing to relieve the defendant from his default in not having presented such bill of exceptions or statement of the case within the time required by law.

The facts as disclosed by the record are these: On August 20, 1912, judgment was entered in plaintiff's favor. Thereafter and on August 28, 1912, the defendant served and filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial, and in December, 1912, duly served upon the plaintiff his proposed statement on motion for a new trial. On September 4, 1913, to which date his time had been duly extended, the plaintiff served upon the defendant his proposed amendments to said statement. Nothing further was done in the matter until March 17, 1914, when the plaintiff served and filed a notice of motion to dismiss the defendant's motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the proposed statement and amendments thereto had not been presented for settlement within the time required by law. The defendant appeared in resistance to said motion, presenting certain affidavits excusing his delay, and also, and a few days later, served and filed a motion for relief from his default and from the plaintiff's motion to dismiss predicated thereon, basing his said motion for relief upon the affidavits already on file. The court refused to grant this latter motion upon the sole ground that it had no jurisdiction to consider it, and thereupon granted the plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendant's motion for a new trial upon the grounds stated.

The appellant contends that the trial court was in error in holding that it had no jurisdiction to grant the defendant's motion for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, in that behalf, he urges that the proceedings against which he was seeking relief was that of the plaintiff's motion to dismiss the defendant's appeal. But we cannot accept this view; for, conceding that the defendant's uncontradicted affidavits furnished a sufficient excuse for delay in not presenting his statement and the amendments thereto for settlement within the time required by law, still it was his default, in not having done so, that he was seeking to excuse and obviate by his affidavits and motion; and since that default had continued for a period of more than six months after the time prescribed by section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure, within which such papers must be presented, the trial court could not grant the relief sought by said motion. This court has held in a number of well-considered cases that section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, applies to such defaults, and limits the time within which application may be made for relief therefrom to six months from the time of the default, and that, after the expiration of such time limit, the court has no jurisdiction to grant such relief. Steen v. Santa Clara Valley M. & L. Co., 4 Cal. App. 448, 88 Pac. 499; Howse v. Norwich, etc., Co., 10 Cal. App. 712, 103 Pac. 156; Harbaugh v. Lassen Irrigation Co., 24 Cal. App. 773, 142 Pac. 847.

It follows that the court was not in error in refusing to grant the motion for the defendant for relief against his default; and it therefore necessarily follows that the court was justified in dismissing the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

1. PERJURY — 9(2) — ADMINISTERING OATH — AUTHORITY OF OFFICER — DE FACTO OFFICER.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

J. R. McLeod was convicted of perjury, and appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph F. Graham and Russell Graham, both of Whittier, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. [1] Appellant was convicted of the crime of perjury. An appeal is taken from the judgment of imprisonment and from the order denying a motion for a new trial. The alleged false statements appeared in an answer filed by appellant to a complaint in a civil action then pending against him in the superior court of Los Angeles county. This answer bore an affidavit of verification in the usual form, from which it appeared that the defendant there, this appellant, made oath to the same on the 1st day of May, 1914, before Fred W. Heatherly, a notary public in and for the county of Los Angeles. It is first claimed that there was no sufficient proof that Heatherly at the time the oath was administered was a qualified notary public. Heatherly was called as a witness. The question was asked him as to whether he was at the time specified in the affidavit a notary public, to which question an objection was sustained. Whereupon the commission issued by the Governor of the state appointing the said Heatherly as a notary public, which commission was dated April 26, 1913, was introduced in evidence. There was also introduced in evidence the record of the county clerk of Los Angeles county showing that Heatherly had taken and subscribed the oath of office in due form. The fault found with this proof was that no showing was made that the notary had ever given the bond required by the statute. The absence of this proof we do not think was available to sustain the point made by the appellant, for the reason that, assuming that no such bond was given, the acts of Heatherly would be valid as the acts of a de facto officer. It has been so expressly held in other jurisdictions. Keeney v. Leas & Lyon, 14 Iowa, 464. The question there arose as to the admissibility of depositions taken before a notary before he had performed all the acts of qualification after appointment. The depositions were ruled out by the trial court, which ruling was reversed on appeal, and it was held that the notary as a de facto officer was authorized to take depositions. To be sure, it is remarked in that case that the court did not determine whether the witnesses whose depositions were taken could for false swearing be convicted of perjury. That such a conviction would necessarily be sustained seems plain; otherwise, no validity could be attached to the acts of the notary de facto. The depositions were admissible as statements made under oath, or they were not admissible at all. A case not direct to this point, but of incidental argumentative weight, is that of Reavis v. Cowell, 56 Cal. 588.

[2, 3] Further objection is made that there was no sufficient proof as to the signature of appellant to the affidavit of verification, or as to his having taken the oath certified by the notary. It appeared by Heatherly's testimony that he was the attorney for appellant in the particular action in which the verified answer referred to was filed. Heatherly was indeed vague in his statements as to what transpired upon the taking of the verification of the answer. He stated that he had no independent recollection of the facts, and that the presence of his certificate and signature were the only matters which suggested to him any connection with the transaction. He did, however, state that he had seen the appellant write and gave it as his belief, or opinion, that the signature attached to the affidavit was that of this appellant. That testimony, we think, aside from the weight to be given to the certificate itself, was sufficient to furnish some evidence of the fact that appellant subscribed the affidavit. Code Civ. Proc. § 1943. And we think further that the certificate of the notary—that is, the jurat attached to the affidavit—was sufficient to furnish prima facie evidence of the making of the affidavit by McLeod, in the manner charged. Baldwin v. Bornheimer, 48 Cal. 433. The acts of a notary public authenticated by his official seal, as was the affidavit in this case, when performed within the line of the duties appertaining to his office, are accepted as first-instance proof by the courts and, unless contradicted, may be sufficient. There was no evidence offered on the part of defendant tending to prove that he did not make the affidavit and take the oath as the notary's certificate gave evidence of. The fact that it was shown without dispute and sufficiently that the notary was the attorney for the appellant in that case, and that the verified answer was filed and used therein, were circumstances which were of some corroborative value in making out proof of those elements of the charge which have hereinbefore been discussed.

As to the sufficiency of the evidence going to show the falsity of the matters set out in the verified answer, we are satisfied that the proof was such as to authorize a verdict of guilty. There was evidence, both direct and circumstantial, which furnishes support to all of the conclusions which the jury was required to make before returning the verdict which it did.

[4] It is claimed that the district attorney in his argument to the jury transcended a right of the defendant when he made reference to the fact that no evidence had been introduced in opposition that furnished by the prosecution. Herein it is claimed that, as the defendant was not compelled to be a witness, any reference to that fact by the prosecutor in argument was prejudicial to his right to a fair trial. The remark objected to consisted of this statement by the deputy district attorney:

"Mr. Brennan's (referring to the chief witness for the prosecution) statement is uncontradicted. The defendant does not have to take the stand."

The district attorney was perfectly justified in his assertion that the testimony of the prosecution was uncontradicted, for there had been no evidence offered in defense. His further statement that the defendant was not obliged to take the stand on his own behalf was merely a declaration as to the law and was favorable to the defendant. Furthermore, at the defendant's own request, the court gave an instruction to the jury which embodied this statement:

"The defendant is not required to prove his innocence, nor is he required to take the stand as a witness himself, unless he desires so to do. * * *"

An examination of the record and of the points urged by counsel for the appellant does not disclose any error which warrants a judgment of reversal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Arthur C. Annesley against Francisco Machado Victorino and wife. From a judgment striking out plaintiff's second amended complaint, he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Arthur Crane, of San Francisco, for appellant. Ross & Ross, of San Mateo, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon an order striking out plaintiff's second amended complaint.

In the original complaint it was alleged that on January 9, 1906, the defendants made a contract with plaintiff's assignor, Edgar L. Wheeler, wherein they agreed to sell to Wheeler the real property described in the complaint. The complaint was defective, and a demurrer thereto having been sustained the plaintiff filed an amended complaint, in which he prayed that his title to the property covered by the contract referred to be quieted. This complaint also was obviously defective, and upon a demurrer thereto being sustained the plaintiff in due time filed a second amended complaint, the allegations and prayer for relief of which make the action one for specific performance. Upon motion this complaint was stricken from the files on the ground that it embodied a new cause of action.

This appeal is not before us upon an order sustaining a demurrer to the second amended complaint, and hence no attention will be paid in this opinion to any suggested defective allegation thereof. We think the court erred in striking out this second amended complaint. It is clear from a consideration of the three pleadings filed by the plaintiff that his asserted cause of action is based upon an interest in the property in question created by the provisions of the above-mentioned contract, the terms of which are set forth in full in each of the complaints and which constitutes the foundation of the action attempted to be stated. The subject of the controversy, or the cause of action, it thus appears, is the same in each pleading. The amendments only stated the facts in different forms to accord with the remedy to which the plaintiff conceived himself to be entitled, and did not change the cause of action. Born v. Castle, 22 Cal. App. 282, 134 Pac. 347; Union L. Co. v. J. W. Schouten & Co., 25 Cal. App. 80, 142 Pac. 910.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS ¶73(8) — ACTION BY WIFE—PERSONAL INJURY.

The husband having been, up to the time he deserted his wife, a necessary party to an action for personal injury to her, the statute of limitations did not commence to run against the cause of action till then, he having refused to join her in an action, Code Civ. Proc. § 370, providing that a wife may sue alone when living apart from her husband because of his desertion, and section 352, that if a person entitled to bring an action be a married woman, and her husband be a necessary party with her in commencing it, the time of such disability is not a part of the time limited for its commencement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. ¶73(8).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Alice Mortell against the Los Angeles College of Osteopathy. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John S. Steely, Frank A. Jeffers, and John F. Sheran, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Jennings & Horton and A. B. Shaw, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff, a married woman, to recover damages by reason of the alleged malpractice of the defendant which resulted in injury to her person. A demurrer was sustained to plaintiff's amended complaint. In addition to the general ground assigned by the demurrer that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in support of which ground no contention is made here, it was objected that the alleged cause of action set out was barred by the statute of limitations; further, that there was a defect of parties plaintiff in that the husband of this plaintiff should have been made a party to the action. Upon plaintiff failing to amend, a judgment of dismissal followed, from which this appeal was taken.

It was alleged in the amended complaint that, at the time the alleged acts of malpractice were committed and thereafter, plaintiff was a married woman living with her husband, and that the husband at all times subsequent to the date of the commission of the alleged acts of malpractice refused to permit the plaintiff to bring an action to recover damages for her injuries, or to join with the plaintiff in such suit. It was further alleged that in the month of September, 1912, the husband deserted the plaintiff against her wish and without her consent, and that he had ever since that time continued to desert and abandon plaintiff without cause and to live separate and apart from her against her wish and consent. This amended complaint was filed on June 5, 1913. There is no contention but that, if the statute of limitations as against the wife's cause of action did not commence to run until the date of the alleged desertion of her by her husband, then the demurrer for that ground was improperly sustained. Section 370 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a wife may sue alone when she is living separate and apart from her husband by reason of his desertion of her. Section 352 of the same Code provides, in part, as follows:

"If a person entitled to bring an action, mentioned in chapter 3 of this title, be, at the time the cause of action accrued, * * * a married woman, and her husband be a necessary party with her in commencing such action, the time of such disability is not a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action."

It was necessary for the plaintiff, if living with her husband, to have him join with her in the prosecution of her claim for damages for the personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by her. Under the facts as alleged in the amended complaint, the statute of limitations did not commence to run against the plaintiff until she was freed of her disability to prosecute the action alone, to wit, until the date of the desertion of her by her husband. Taking that date as the date to be considered in determining the plea made to the amended complaint by demurrer, it is clear that the court was in error in making the order sustaining the demurrer. That the husband was a necessary party to the action at the time the cause thereof accrued and until the date of his desertion of the wife is sustained by the decision in the case of Moody v. Southern Pacific Co., 167 Cal. 786, 141 Pac. 388. That case answers all of the objections made by the respondent, and upon the authority of it a reversal must be ordered.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

2. VENUE ⇨52(1) — CHANGE — CONVENIENCE OF WITNESSES—PREPONDERANCE IN NUMBER.

The mere preponderance in the number of witnesses claimed to be necessary to the party moving for change of venue for convenience of witnesses does not entirely control the court's discretion in the premises, as regard may be given to the character of the proposed testimony, and the court may determine from the showing made whether there be any necessity for the testimony of any or all of the desired witnesses.

3. VENUE ⇨53—CHANGE—MOTION—STIPULATION IN OPPOSITION.

In opposition to plaintiff's motion for change of venue from San Francisco to Tehama county on the ground of convenience of witnesses, defendant's written stipulation, which, on the condition that the action be tried in the superior court of San Francisco, admitted as true certain facts involved and issues raised by the cross-complaint, was properly received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 79; Dec. Dig. ⇨53.]

4. VENUE ⇨53—CHANGE—ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

The superior court of San Francisco did not abuse its discretion, in so far as its order involved the issues raised by the cross-complaint, in denying plaintiff's motion for change of venue on the ground of convenience of witnesses, where defendant's written stipulation, properly received in opposition, eliminated his cause of action for damages as pleaded in the cross-complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by E. J. Blossom against C. W. Waller. From an order denying plaintiff's motion that the action, instituted in the superior court of Tehama county, the venue of which was changed to the city and county of San Francisco on defendant's motion, be transferred to the superior court of Tehama county for trial, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

J. T. Matlock, Jr., of Red Bluff, and W. W. Bedford, of San Francisco, for appellant. Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, and McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This action for damages for an alleged breach of contract was instituted in the superior court of Tehama county. The defendant's motion for a change of venue to the city and county of San Francisco, the place of his residence at the time of the commencement of the action, was granted. The defendant answering, denied all of the material allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and, cross-complaining, prayed for damages claimed to have been suffered by him because of the plaintiff's failure to keep the terms of the contract imposed upon him. In due course plaintiff made a motion that the action be transferred to the superior court of Tehama county for trial upon the ground of the convenience of witnesses, supporting the motion by his own affidavit.

Therein the plaintiff set forth the names of certain witnesses residing in or in the vicinity of Tehama county, and averred that it was his intention to call them as witnesses in his behalf, and that they would testify in a particular way to certain matters and things which apparently were material and relevant only to the issues raised by the defendant's cross-complaint. In reply the defendant filed his affidavit, denying generally all the material averments of the plaintiff's affidavit, and in particular denying that the parties named as prospective witnesses for the plaintiff would testify in his favor, as stated in his affidavit. The affidavit of the defendant showed further that in support of his case he would rely upon the testimony of several witnesses to material matters who resided in San Francisco. The defendant also filed affidavits by several persons, upon whom the plaintiff claimed to rely for testimony favorable to him, to the effect that they had not been spoken to by the plaintiff upon the subject of the controversy in suit, and would not testify as stated in his affidavit, but, on the contrary, would testify to facts favorable to the defendant. The defendant also presented the affidavit of a third person, which tended to show that the remaining witnesses, designated in the affidavit of the plaintiff and relied upon by him for testimony favorable to his side of the case, either upon the issues raised by the pleadings generally or those raised by the cross-complaint, had not been approached by the plaintiff, and would not testify as he expected. Supplementing these affidavits, the defendant offered, and there was received in evidence upon the hearing of the motion, his written stipulation, which, upon the condition that the action be tried in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, admitted as true certain facts involved in the issues raised by the cross-complaint. The defendant at the same time offered to stipulate and admit that a certain fact, upon which he relied in support of one item of his damage resulting from the plaintiff's alleged breach of the contract, did not exist as it was pleaded in his cross-complaint. To the showing thus made by the defendant the plaintiff made no reply. The motion was denied, and the appeal is from the order thus made.

[1-4] A motion for a change of venue, grounded upon the convenience of witnesses, rests in the discretion of the trial court, the exercise of which will not be disturbed in the absence of a showing of its abuse; and it is settled that a mere preponderance in the number of the witnesses claimed to be necessary to the moving party does not entirely control the exercise of the court's discretion. Regard may be given to the character of the proposed testimony; and the court may therefore determine for itself from the showing made whether or not there be any necessity for the testimony of any or all of the desired witnesses. Tait v. Midway, etc., Co., 151 Pac. 378; Pascoe v. Baker, 158 Cal. 232, 110 Pac. 815; Bird v. Utica, etc., Co., 2 Cal. App. 672, 86 Pac. 509. Stipulations of the character proposed in the present case may properly be received in opposition to a motion for a change of venue, made upon the ground of the convenience of witnesses. The stipulations of the defendant, if accepted, would in effect have eliminated the defendant's cause of action for damages as pleaded in his cross-complaint, and consequently the plaintiff would not have been put to the necessity of producing witnesses to testify in his behalf upon that phase of the case. This being so, it cannot be said that the trial court abused its discretion in so far as the order made involved the issues raised by the cross-complaint. Schilling v. Buhne, 139 Cal. 611, 73 Pac. 431; Stockton, etc., v. Houser, 103 Cal. 377, 37 Pac. 179; Miller & Lux v. Kern, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 132, 73 Pac. 836.

[5] With the issues raised by the cross-complaint eliminated there would have remained for determination only the issues raised by the complaint and the answer; and upon an analysis of the showing made for and against the motion it is apparent to us that the determination of the latter issues would depend largely upon the testimony of the plaintiff and defendant. As between these the inconvenience of attending the trial would not be a factor; and in so far as the testimony of other witnesses might be necessary to the determination of those issues, we are not satisfied that the showing made upon behalf of the plaintiff compels the conclusion that the greater convenience of the witnesses generally would be served by a trial of the action in the county of the plaintiff's residence.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 15, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 13, 1916.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 742(2) — ACCOMPLICE — CHARACTER—QUESTION FOR JURY.

It is for the jury to determine from the evidence whether, as a matter of fact, a witness is an accomplice, if the facts are disputed; as only where the admitted facts and conduct of a witness necessarily establish his participation in the guilty act or his guilty relation thereto should the court determine and instruct the jury as a matter of law that the witness is to be regarded as an accomplice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1098, 1138, 1720; Dec. Dig. 742(2).]

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 742(2) — ACCOMPLICE — TESTIMONY.

In a prosecution for burning insured property with intent to defraud the insurer, testimony of a witness that he heard statements and observed conduct of defendant which must have warned him that an incendiary fire was contemplated, etc., was not such an admission of guilty participation in the alleged crime as would warrant the court in declaring the witness to be an accomplice without leaving the fact to be determined by the jury.

3. ARSON ☞19—BURNING INSURED PROPERTY—INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY.

An information charging the burning of insured property with intent to defraud the insurer, by charging that defendant willfully burned, injured, or destroyed insured property with intent to defraud the insurer, was not void for uncertainty because not stating facts constituting fraud upon the insurance company, nor the particular circumstances connecting defendant with that element of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-40; Dec. Dig. ☞19.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

W. O. Truax was convicted of willfully burning and destroying insured property with intent to defraud the insurer, in violation of Pen. Code, § 548. From the judgment, and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

W. F. Frazier, of Calexico, C. Ibeson Sweet, of Los Angeles, and O. V. Willson, of El Centro, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Appellant was convicted of willfully burning and destroying insured property with intent to defraud the insurer, in violation of section 548 of the Penal Code. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It seems to be conceded that the only evidence, which tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, is contained in the testimony of three witnesses, who, by their own admission, were accomplices of the defendant, and in the testimony of one Arthur Barnaman. The court refused to instruct the jury that Barnaman was an accomplice, but gave appropriate instructions upon the rules requiring corroboration of the testimony of accomplices.

[1] It is for the jury to determine from the evidence whether, as a matter of fact, the witness is an accomplice, if the facts are disputed. It is only where, the acts and conduct of a witness being admitted, they necessarily establish the witness' participation in the guilty act, or guilty relation thereto, that the court should determine and instruct the jury as a matter of law that the witness is to be regarded as an accomplice. People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 436, 119 Pac. 901, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 704. According to his own testimony, the witness Barnaman had heard statements and observed conduct of the defendant which must have warned him that an incendiary fire was contemplated. He said that he knew there was to be a fire at the Bassett house and that, after receiving such information, he at the request of Burright (one of the admitted accomplices), carried a bed to that house, and he supposed that the bed was to be used in connection with the fire. But Barnaman modified this testimony by stating that he had not visited the Bassett house within two weeks preceding the fire; that it was later on, after carrying the furniture there, that he found a fire was to occur, and that he was "only suspicious that that was the particular house" that was to be burned.

[2] However reprehensible the conduct of this witness may have been we cannot say that this testimony constitutes such an admission of guilty participation in the alleged crime as would warrant the court in declaring him to be an accomplice without leaving the fact to be determined by the jury.

[3] Appellant also contends that the information is void for uncertainty, because it does not state facts constituting the intended fraud upon the insurance company, nor the particular circumstances connecting appellant with that element of the offense; and that therefore the demurrer should have been sustained. But we think that the demurrer was properly overruled. In People v. Barbera, 157 Pac. 532, decided February 9, 1916, we had under consideration an indictment charging a like offense, in which the facts were stated in similar form to this information. For reasons there stated, it was held that the indictment was sufficiently direct, certain, and complete as to the circumstances of the offense.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by William T. Grosse against C. R. Petersen and the Pioneer Soap Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying defendants' motion for new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Otis and Mastick & Partridge, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. In this action the plaintiff sued to recover the sum of $40,000 as damages for the breach of a contract. Upon the verdict of a jury judgment was entered in plaintiff's favor in the sum of $3,500. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

Briefly stated, the facts are these: The defendants were engaged in the business of manufacturing soap. The plaintiff was a soap expert and salesman, and for many years prior to the making of the contract in suit had been a successful dealer in soap and the Pacific Coast agent for soap manufacturers. Plaintiff was possessed of a secret formula for the manufacture of soap, containing an ingredient claimed by him to possess peculiar cleansing qualities, and the especial excellence of soap manufactured in accordance with his formula had been successfully demonstrated. Plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendants for the manufacture at a stipulated price of a laundry soap, to be known as "Wil-Gro" soap, which was "to be a high-grade extra No. 1 soap same quality as Pioneer Soap Company's (defendant) Medallion soap," weighing from 5¼ to 7 ounces per bar when cured, and which was to be made and mixed according to plaintiff's formula as set out in the contract. The contract further covenanted that the defendants would not use the plaintiff's secret ingredient in the manufacture of any soap but that of the plaintiff.

The first count of the plaintiff's complaint alleged that he had expended in payment to the defendants for soap delivered to him under said contract, supposedly manufactured in accordance with his formula, the sum of $4,167.10; that he had paid the sum of $3,344.33 for the secret ingredient which was supplied to the defendants for the purpose of being used in the manufacture of the soap, and the sum of $5,066 in the creation of a market for the commodity when manufactured; and then proceeded upon the theory that the plaintiff was damaged in the aggregate of those sums by the defendants' breach of the contract in furnishing an inferior soap not manufactured as agreed, which rendered futile the expenditures thus incurred.

The second count of the complaint fixed the plaintiff's damage at $5,000 because of the defendants' unauthorized use of the plaintiff's secret ingredient in the manufacture of their own soap.

The third count of the complaint called for damages in the sum of $25,000, because of the alleged injury to the plaintiff's business and reputation as a soap dealer and his diminished ability to make sales of his specialty.

The evidence adduced in support of the plaintiff's case tended to show that upon the execution of the contract he commenced to advertise and create a market for the soap to be manufactured for him by the defendants. This he continued to do until some time in April, 1912. During this time he ordered and received from the defendants approximately 100,000 pounds of soap supposedly made and mixed in conformity with the formula specified in the contract, for the manufacture of which he supplied to the defendants 6,390 pounds of the secret ingredient, which was 15 pounds in excess of the quantity necessary to fill plaintiff's orders if the soap had been manufactured according to the formula contained in the contract. The defendants did not manufacture this soap according to the agreed formula, but used in such manufacture from 35 to 50 per cent. only of the proportion of secret ingredient specified therein. They diverted large quantities of this ingredient to their own use, employing it in the manufacture of their own soap, and also retained in their possession after the completion of the plaintiff's orders about 1,000 pounds thereof. The soap when received by the plaintiff was wrapped and boxed, and the plaintiff sold and shipped the same to his customers in the original packages, disposing during a portion of the year 1912 of some 88,000 pounds. Occasionally a customer of the plaintiff found fault with the soap upon the ground that it did not do the work claimed for it; but the plaintiff, knowing the efficacy of the soap when made according to his formula, and having implicit confidence in the business ability and integrity of the defendants, gave but little heed to the few complaints thus made until something like a year after the execution of the contract, when he discovered the fact above mentioned that the defendants had employed in the manufacture of the soap a smaller proportion of the secret ingredient than specified in the formula. Thereupon the plaintiff ceased selling the article as Wil-Gro soap, disposing of it as ordinary soap at a reduced price, and still had on hand unsold a considerable quantity thereof.

The principal point urged in support of the appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the jury implied by the verdict that the plaintiff was damaged by the defendants' alleged breach of the contract in the sum of $3,500, or any other sum.

[1] Much of the briefs of the respective counsel is devoted to a discussion of the measure of damages; but upon that subject and the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict it will suffice to say that upon the whole the evidence shows that the contract in controversy was entered into by the parties thereto with reference to special circumstances known to both parties, and therefore the damages recoverable for a breach of the contract are not only those arising naturally therefrom and according to the usual course of business, but also those which under the special circumstances connected with the transaction flowed from the breach. McDonald v. Kansas, etc., 149 Fed. 360, 365, 79 C. A. 298, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1110; Perry Tire & Lumber Co. v. Reynolds, 100 Va. 264, 40 S. E. 920; 3 Elliott on Contracts, sec. 2131.

In the present case, the circumstances surrounding and attending the making of the contract which to an extent make and measure the damage suffered by the plaintiff for the undoubted breach of the contract are briefly stated these: The contract was entered into between plaintiff and defendants with the purpose on the part of the plaintiff—which purpose was apparently known to the defendants—of permanently establishing a market for a soap of superior merit and value, which was to be manufactured for the plaintiff in exact accord with the formula specified in the contract. Upon the faith of the contract entered into the plaintiff expended much time, effort, and money in successfully creating a market for his soap, which presumably and evidently was intended to be of a permanent nature rather than a mere temporary expedient for the making of an immediate profit from the sale of the first lots of soap manufactured.

[2] Under the rule stated, the measure of the plaintiff's damage for the defendants' willful and wrongful violation of the contract would, ordinarily and under the special circumstances narrated, be at the very least the difference between his actual expenditures, including the value of his own services, which he had been induced to make on the faith of the contract, and the sum received by him from the sales made of the soap delivered up to the time that the market which he had created had been destroyed in consequence of the defendants' breach of the contract. Cederburg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 93, 34 Pac. 625; U. S. v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 4 Sup. Ct. 81, 28 L. Ed. 168. In the pursuit and accomplishment of his design and the apparent purpose of the contract, the evidence shows that the plaintiff, upon the faith of the contract, expended in the aggregate the sum of $10,577; and that prior to the decline and final destruction of the market which he had created for Wil-Gro soap he had received from the sales of the soap manufactured and delivered to him by the defendants the sum of $6,942. The actual loss to him, therefore, in this aspect of the case, was the sum of $3,635; and in estimating his damage there must be added to this the further sum of $675, the value of the secret ingredient wrongfully converted by the defendants to their own use. It will thus be seen that the evidence not only supports the verdict, but that the aggregate of the plaintiff's actual loss resulting from the defendants' breach of the contract was much in excess of the sum awarded to him by the jury.

[3] The trial court did not err in its ruling permitting evidence of plaintiff's average earnings while employed by third parties in work similar in character and extent to the work which for some fourteen months he did in creating a market for his Wil-Gro soap. Of course, the amount of such earnings in themselves did not fix the value of the plaintiff's time and labor expended upon the faith of the contract in controversy, but it was some evidence of the value of the plaintiff's services, and was therefore admissible for the purpose of assisting the jury in fixing the value of the same. 1 Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) § 265.

[4] We are not impressed with the point that the plaintiff waived the breach complained of and the damages resulting therefrom because he ordered and accepted soap from the defendants after he had heard some complaints from his customers that "it would not do the work." These complaints were, apparently, few and far between, and it was not until a year and more after the completion of the contract that he was positively and definitely informed that the defendants were not manufacturing the soap in accordance with the agreed formula. Even if the soap had been manufactured strictly according to the formula, it is not unlikely that there would have been some slight complaint that at times it did not fully measure up to the representations made for it; and a few vague complaints made of the soap delivered to the plaintiff were not in our opinion sufficient as a matter of law to charge the plaintiff with knowledge of the breach of the contract, and thereby operate to transform his subsequent acceptance of the soap into a waiver of the original terms of the contract.

[5] The trial court, among other things, in effect instructed the jury that, if it was found that the defendants failed to furnish the plaintiff with "a high-grade extra No. 1 soap same quality as Pioneer Soap Company's Medallion soap," such failure constituted a breach of the contract; and it is now insisted that there is no evidence that the basic ingredients employed in the manufacture of the plaintiff's Wil-Gro soap were in any wise inferior to the basic ingredients usually employed in the manufacture of Medallion soap, and that therefore the tendency of the instruction in question was to mislead the jury, and was consequently prejudicially erroneous.

While the evidence upon this phase of the case is more or less confusing, there was some evidence that "there was a fixed formula for the Medallion soap" which was varied from in the manufacture of the "Medallion soap" which was employed as a basis for the manufacture of the plaintiff's Wil-Gro soap. True, it was the claim of witnesses for the defendants that the variation from the formula for the manufacture of Medallion soap was an immaterial one, which did not injuriously affect its quality and value as a base for the manufacture of the plaintiff's soap; but upon the other hand there is evidence to be found in the record tending to show that "Medallion soap" was not a No. 1 piece of soap because the ingredients which went into it consisted in part of "grease, a cheap grade of resin not the best, and instead of the soap getting two washes like the ordinary soap it was only put through one. It wasn't cleansed properly, and it was finished very poorly." It is not entirely clear to us whether the latter testimony had reference to the Medallion soap ordinarily manufactured by the defendants according to the formula fixed therefor, or was intended to apply to the "Medallion soap" which was especially used as a base for the manufacture of the plaintiff's soap. In the presence of this uncertainty in the evidence, we are not prepared to say that the question as to whether or not the defendants had complied with the contract in the particular stated in the instruction complained of was improperly submitted to the jury.

The remaining points urged in support of the appeal are more or less involved in those previously discussed; they have therefore in effect been disposed of and need not be now adverted to.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE — 265—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—WIFE'S RIGHT TO REVOKE GIFT — STATUTE.

If the proviso, added to Civil Code, § 172, in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 425), that though the husband has the management of the community property, with absolute power of disposition other than testamentary, he cannot make a gift of such property or convey it without valuable consideration, unless the wife consent in writing, confers upon her, during the marriage, any right respecting gifts of the community property by the husband, it is merely a right to revoke the gift, and, if necessary, sue to recover the property, not as her separate estate, but to reinstate it as part of the community property, with the title vested in the husband.

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — 95(1)—ACCRUAL OF RIGHT—RECOVERY OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY—KNOWLEDGE.

Where a husband makes a gift of community property, the wife having the right to recover the property for the community estate, if she has knowledge of the gift or is put on inquiry concerning it, the statute of limitations begins to run immediately against the cause of action, and if she is ignorant thereof at the time, it will begin to run as soon as she discovers the fact, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence should have discovered it.

6. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — 195(1) — PRESUMPTION — KNOWLEDGE OF AGGRIEVED PARTY.

In an action by heirs of a wife to revoke her husband's gifts of community property unassented to by her, in the absence of averment that the wife did not know of the gifts when they were made, and allegations excusing her ignorance and failure to make discovery, it must be presumed that she knew of them.

7. HUSBAND AND WIFE — 265—COMMUNITY PROPERTY — GIFT BY HUSBAND — VOIDABLE CHARACTER AS TO WIFE—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 172, as amended in 1891, gifts by a husband of the community property did not become void at his death, but were only voidable by the wife at her option.

8. HUSBAND AND WIFE — 265—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—HUSBAND'S POWER OF TESTAMENTARY DISPOSITION.

A husband's testamentary disposition of more than one-half of the community property is not absolutely void as to the wife, but only voidable by her upon proof of the facts necessary to that end.

9. HUSBAND AND WIFE — 265—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—VOIDABLE GIFT BY HUSBAND—RATIFICATION BY WIFE.

Gifts of community property by a husband, with the intent and purpose to deprive his wife of her right to one-half thereof upon his death and to prevent her giving a part thereof to children other than those to whom the husband gave, were not void, but only voidable at the wife's option, and capable of ratification and confirmation by her.

10. HUSBAND AND WIFE — 265—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—GIFT BY HUSBAND—CONSENT TO AND RATIFICATION BY WIFE.

Where a husband, to his wife's knowledge, gave to two of their children a large part of his estate, consisting of community property, without the wife's written consent, as required by Civ. Code, § 172, as amended in 1891, and the wife's will, leaving her property to the three other children, recited that she intentionally omitted making provision for the two for whom her husband had provided, because he had done so, such wife consented in writing to and ratified and confirmed her husband's gifts of the community property to the two children.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Claus A. Spreckels and Rudolph Spreckels, as executors of the will of Anna C. Spreckels, and as executors of the will of Claus Spreckels, and by them as individuals, and Emma C. Ferris against John D. Spreckels and Adolph Spreckels. From judgment for defendants on demurrer, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Charles S. Wheeler, John F. Bowie, and Cushing & Cushing, all of San Francisco (Nathan M. Moran, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, for respondents. Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, amici curiæ.

SHAW, J. This is an action by Claus A. Spreckels and Rudolph Spreckels as executors of the will of Anna C. Spreckels, and also in their capacity as executors of the will of Claus Spreckels, and by them and Emma C. Ferris, as individuals, to compel an accounting by the defendants respecting certain property received by them from the decedent Claus Spreckels in his lifetime, and for restitution thereof, so far as it exceeded one-half of the community property of Claus Spreckels and Anna C. Spreckels, his wife, and, if restitution cannot be made, then for judgment for the value thereof. The court below sustained a demurrer to the second amended complaint, and thereupon gave judgment for the defendants. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

Claus A. Spreckels and Anna C. Spreckels intermarried on July 11, 1852, and lived together as husband and wife, residing in California, from that time until the death of Claus Spreckels on December 26, 1908. Anna C. Spreckels died on February 15, 1910. They had but five children. Three of them are the plaintiffs above named. The other two are the defendants. All the property owned by the decedent, Claus Spreckels, during his marriage and at his death, was acquired during said marriage and was community property. In the eight years between 1896 and 1905, Claus Spreckels made gifts to John D. Spreckels and Adolph B. Spreckels of large amounts of this community property aggregating in value about $25,000,000, according to the allegations of the complaint, leaving remaining in his possession and ownership, at the time of his death, other property not exceeding $10,000,000 in value. Anna C. Spreckels did not, in her husband's lifetime, consent to the making of any of these gifts, either in writing or otherwise. The plaintiffs, by this action, seek to recover, on behalf of the estate of Claus Spreckels and also on behalf of the estate of Anna C. Spreckels and also in their own right, as legatees and devisees of the entire estate of Anna C. Spreckels, a one-half interest in the specific property so given to the defendants, or an amount equal to one-half thereof, if such property cannot be identified.

The first provision of our statutory law on the subject of the respective rights of the husband and wife in the community property during the marriage was section 9 of the act of April 17, 1850 (Stats. 1850, p. 254). It was as follows:

"The husband shall have the entire management and control of the common property with the like absolute power of disposition as of his own separate estate."

Construing this act, the court held that it and other statutes in force were intended to adopt the Mexican law upon the subject of community property, and decided that, during the marriage, the estate of the husband in the community property was absolute, while that of the wife was a mere expectancy, as that of an heir. But in consequence of the provisions of section 11 of the same act, declaring that on the death of either husband or wife one half of the common property should go to the survivor and the other half to the descendants of the deceased spouse, and, under the Mexican law of community property, it was further held that the husband could not, by his will, prevent her from inheriting one-half thereof upon his death. Beard v. Knox, 5 Cal. 256, 63 Am. Dec. 125; Scott v. Ward, 13 Cal. 469; Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 301; Packard v. Arellanes, 17 Cal. 538; Fuller v. Ferguson, 26 Cal. 565; Lord v. Hough, 43 Cal. 581. Section 9 of the act of 1850 remained in force until the enactment of the Civil Code in 1872, the subject being therein covered by section 172 thereof. Codifying the previous decisions regarding the testamentary power of the husband over community property, the provision was, in the Code, changed to read as follows:

"The husband has the management and control of the community property with the like absolute power of disposition (other than testamentary) as he has of his separate estate."

This section remained without alteration until 1891 (St. 1891, p. 425) when a proviso was added making the section read as follows:

"The husband has the management and control of the community property, with the like absolute power of disposition, other than testamentary, as he has of his separate estate; provided, however, that he cannot make a gift of such community property, or convey the same without a valuable consideration, unless the wife, in writing, consent thereto."

In 1901 (St. 1901, p. 598) another proviso was added as follows:

"And provided also, that no sale, conveyance or incumbrance of the furniture, furnishings and fittings of the home, or of the clothing and wearing apparel of the wife or minor children, which is community property, shall be made without the written consent of the wife."

The present case does not involve any household goods, fittings or wearing apparel. This proviso therefore has no application to the case, and we need not consider it further.

The appellants contend that the declaration of the proviso that the husband "cannot make a gift" of community property, unless the wife consent thereto in writing, limits his power in that respect absolutely, so that such a gift is absolutely void even in his own lifetime, and may be recovered by him or by the executors of his will after his death. They also contend that if not void as to the husband, such gifts are absolutely void as to the wife, if she survives him, and that she, in her lifetime, or her representatives or heirs after her death, may recover the same. Upon these theories they seek to maintain the sufficiency of the complaint.

Under the statute prior to the addition of the first proviso in 1891, it was the established doctrine in this state that during the marriage the husband was the sole and exclusive owner of all of the community property, and that the wife had no title thereto, nor interest or estate therein, other than a mere expectancy as heir, if she survived him. In addition to the cases above cited, see Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 311; Greiner v. Greiner, 58 Cal. 119; People v. Swalm, 80 Cal. 49, 22 Pac. 67, 13 Am. St. Rep. 96; Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 283, 24 Pac. 743; Corker v. Corker, 95 Cal. 309, 30 Pac. 541; Fallbrook I. D. v. Abila, 106 Cal. 362, 39 Pac. 794; Estate of Burdick, 112 Cal. 393, 44 Pac. 734; Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 343, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170; Sharp v. Loupe, 120 Cal. 93, 52 Pac. 134, 586; Cunha v. Hughes, 122 Cal. 112, 54 Pac. 535, 68 Am. St. Rep. 27; Peiser v. Griffin, 125 Cal. 12, 57 Pac. 690; Estate of Merchants, 143 Cal. 539, 77 Pac. 475.

The limitation upon the husband's testamentary power contained in the Code was not understood to vest in the wife, during the marriage, any interest or estate whatever in the community property, but merely to constitute a restriction upon the husband's power. If the husband undertook to dispose of all of the community property by will, giving the wife less than one-half thereof, such disposition was not absolutely void, but had the effect of putting her to her election whether to take under the statute or under the will. If she took the latter provision, the disposition in the will of the remaining portion of the property was thereby affirmed and made valid. Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 346; Estate of Stewart, 74 Cal. 104, 15 Pac. 445; Estate of Smith, 108 Cal. 119, 40 Pac. 1037; Estate of Vogt, 154 Cal. 509, 98 Pac. 265. The testamentary disposition in such a case, therefore, was voidable, but not absolutely void. If it had been void, in the extreme sense, the logical result would have been that a mere election by the wife would not transfer the remainder of her statutory half to the other beneficiaries under the will, but that a conveyance by her would be necessary. It has been always understood that her election is sufficient for that purpose, and that the will, in that event, operates to transfer the property.

In the case of Spreckels v. Spreckels, supra, the question arose whether the amendment of 1891, adding the first proviso, had the effect of making an attempt by the husband during the marriage to dispose of the community property absolutely void, so that the husband could, in his lifetime, recover a gift thereof made by him without the consent of his wife. The property there involved was the property of Claus Spreckels, the father of the plaintiffs and defendants herein, the gift being made to Rudolph Spreckels. The court did not decide this question, but held that the amendment of 1891 could not be construed retroactively and applied to property previously acquired, so as to deprive the husband of the right theretofore vested in him to make a gift of that community property. In the present action the plaintiffs avoid the effect of this decision, with respect to a very considerable portion of the property involved, by appropriate allegations that it was acquired after the year 1891, and therefore, of course, subject to the limitation in the proviso.

We have been able to find but two decisions of this court upon this subject involving community property which vested after the year 1891, namely, Fulkerson v. Stiles, 156 Cal. 704, 105 Pac. 966, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 181, and Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 281, 104 Pac. 308. In each of these cases the doctrine above stated, that the wife has no interest or estate in community property during the marriage relation, and that the husband is the absolute owner thereof, subject to the limitations upon his power of disposition, is reiterated.

[1] We are satisfied that the proviso of 1891 does not render a gift of community property by the husband without the consent of the wife void as to him, nor confer upon him, in his lifetime, or upon his personal representatives after his death, any right or power to revoke the gift or recover the property. There is nothing in the language to express the idea that the title does not, as before, remain wholly in him. The provision is merely for a limitation upon his power to dispose of it. He is bound by his own gift as fully as if it was of his separate estate. The demurrer was properly sustained so far as the executors of the will of Claus Spreckels are concerned.

[2, 3] Neither does the proviso purport to vest in the wife, during the marriage, any present interest or estate in the community property given away by the husband without her written consent. In view of the long-settled doctrine that the entire estate therein is in the husband during the marriage relation, a doctrine that had become a fixed and well-understood rule of property, it is not to be supposed that the Legislature would have made a change of so radical a character without plain language to that effect. We do not find in the proviso such language, nor anything that can reasonably be so construed. If it confers upon her, during the marriage, any right respecting such gifts, it is nothing more than a right to revoke the gift and, if necessary, sue to recover the property, not as her separate estate, but to reinstate it as a part of the community property, with the title vested in the husband and subject to sale by him, as before.

We do not find it necessary to determine whether this right accrues to her at once when the gift is made, or whether it remains in abeyance until her expectancy in the community property becomes vested by the dissolution of the marriage by death or divorce. In either case, upon the facts alleged, the present action must fail, as we will now proceed to show.

[4-6] If the right accrues to her upon the making of the gift, a cause of action would exist in her favor at that moment to set aside the gifts. The statute of limitations would immediately begin to run against that cause of action, if she had knowledge of the gift, or was put on inquiry concerning it. If she was ignorant thereof at the time, it would begin to run as soon as she discovered the fact, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence should have discovered it. The alleged gifts of real property were made not later than 1897, and the latest gifts of personal property were made in 1904. One ground of demurrer is that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. The demurrer does not specify any section of the statute, but that is not necessary when the question is raised by demurrer. Brennan v. Ford, 46 Cal. 7; Williams v. Bergin, 116 Cal. 59, 47 Pac. 877. There is no claim here that Mrs. Spreckels did not know of these gifts when they were made, nor any allegations excusing her ignorance thereof and failure to make discovery, as is required in such cases. Lady Washington v. Wood, 113 Cal. 486, 45 Pac. 809; Del Campo v. Camarillo, 154 Cal. 657, 98 Pac. 1049; People v. San Joaquin, etc., Ass'n, 151 Cal. 807, 91 Pac. 740. In the absence of averment, it must be presumed that she knew of them. Consequently, assuming that she had such right during the marriage, the statute of limitations immediately thereupon began to run against her, and any action by her of that character would have been barred, as to the real property, in 1902, and as to the personal property in 1907 or 1908. Code Civ. Proc., secs. 318, 338, 343. In this aspect of the case it is immaterial whether the gifts are regarded as absolutely void, with respect to her right, or only voidable. In either case the action would be barred. If barred as to her, it would, of course, be barred as to her representatives and heirs after her death.

If we assume the other alternative, that the right of the wife to attack these gifts did not accrue in this case until the dissolution of the marriage by the death of the husband, the case presents a somewhat different aspect. The action, in that event, would not be barred by the statute of limitations. The right of her heirs and personal representatives to avoid the gifts and to recover what would have been her share thereof if the husband died seised of this property leaving her surviving would be complete. It is claimed on the part of the respondents that the provisions of her will show a ratification and confirmation of these gifts. In the consideration of this question it is, therefore, material to determine whether such gifts, as to the wife, became absolutely void upon the death of the husband, or only voidable at her option. If absolutely void, the result would be that the title to the property would have vested in her at his death, and the gifts would perhaps be incapable of confirmation except by a transfer from her.

[7,8] We are of the opinion that the gifts did not become void at the death of the husband, but were only voidable by the wife at her option. The limitation upon his power to give is not greater in its prohibitive effect than the preceding limitation upon his testamentary power. One is as absolute as the other. Both, in terms, include all the community property, and appear to withhold power to dispose of all or any of it in the proscribed manner. Yet, as above stated, it is well settled that a husband's testamentary disposition of more than one-half of the community property is not absolutely void as to the wife, but only voidable. The limitation upon the husband's power to make a gift is even less positive than that upon the testamentary power, for it depends upon two questions of fact; the absence of a valuable consideration, and the absence of her written consent, both of which may have to be proven by collateral evidence. The gift, when made, immediately vests the property in the donee subject to her right of revocation. She may give her consent at any time during her life, and if she does, the gift becomes absolute with respect to her. The provision was manifestly intended solely for the benefit of the wife. If she seeks to assert such right, it is incumbent upon her to show that the facts exist upon which it depends. The conclusion seems inevitable that the gift is not absolutely void with respect to her, but only voidable by her upon proof of the facts necessary to that end. It comes within the rule stated in Wildes v. Van Voorhis, 81 Mass. (15 Gray) 143. Construing a statute similar in language and purpose to ours, but more positive in terms, for it declared that the husband's deed to a homestead was void unless the wife joined therein, the court there said:

"In many cases where a transaction is declared void in terms by a rule of the common law, or even expressly by statute, where the obvious interest of the rule is to secure and protect the rights of another party, the construction of law is that it is voidable so far that it shall not operate to defeat or impair those rights. Such deed is not a dead letter, but can be avoided by such persons only, and at such time and in such manner as may be necessary to secure those rights. In other respects it has its natural effect."

In Boyd v. Blankman, 29 Cal. 35, 87 Am. Dec. 146, the court said:

"Whenever the act done takes effect as to some purposes, and is void as to persons who have an interest in impeaching it, the act is not a nullity, and therefore, in a legal sense, it is not utterly void, but merely voidable."

—and again at page 40 of 29 Cal., 87 Am. Dec. 146:

"The word 'void' will be construed as 'voidable' when the provision is introduced for the benefit of the parties only, and not for public purposes, and to protect those who are incapable of protecting themselves."

See, also, Harris v. Taylor, 15 Cal. 349; Williams v. Borgwaldt, 119 Cal. 83, 51 Pac. 15; Hill v. Finigan, 77 Cal. 272, 19 Pac. 494, 11 Am. St. Rep. 279.

[9] The complaint alleges that Claus Spreckels made these gifts with the intent and purpose to deprive his wife of her right to one-half of the community property upon his death and to prevent her from giving a part thereof to the other children, plaintiffs herein. Upon these facts, admitted by the demurrer, it is argued that fraud is established and that it is, in effect, an action to set aside or impeach the gifts on the ground that they constituted a fraud upon the wife. If it were conceded that this would constitute a cause of action in favor of the wife which she might pursue before his death, the result would be that the action would be barred by the statute of limitations, for the right of action would accrue upon the making of the gifts, or upon the wife's discovery that a gift had been made. It is not alleged that she was ignorant of the alleged intention, or that she did not discover it, after due diligence, within the period of limitation prior to her death. But, in any event, the gifts would not be void for that cause, but only voidable at her option, and capable of ratification and confirmation by her.

[10] We are thus brought to the question whether the wife has ratified and confirmed these gifts by her acts after his death, assuming that then, and not before, she became vested of the right to impeach or avoid them. By the will of her husband all the property of which he died seised was declared to be community property. It purported to dispose of all of his property that was subject to his testamentary disposition at his death. As his wife survived him, the effect was that he did not, by the will, dispose of the one-half of the estate that descended to her at his death, but left it to go to her by the law. The other half he gave to certain trustees in trust, among other purposes, "to pay over the net annual income thereof to my wife during the term of her natural life." Subject to the trusts, the corpus of the estate was given to the three plaintiffs, Claus A. Spreckels, Rudolph Spreckels, and to Emma C. Ferris and her children, in three equal parts, to be divided between them at the death of his widow, as in the will directed. Estate of Spreckels, 162 Cal. 559, 586, 123 Pac. 371. The will further declared, with regard to the two defendants herein, as follows:

"Fourth. I make no provision in this will for my sons John D. Spreckels and Adolph Spreckels for the reason that I have already given to them a large part of my estate."

This will was duly admitted to probate on January 9, 1909, and the executors named duly qualified as such on the same day, and they have ever since continued to act therein. The widow became entitled to receive the annual income of the one-half of the estate either immediately upon his death (Civ. Code, § 1366), or at the expiration of one year thereafter (Civ. Code, § 1368). The complaint does not aver that she received any of it in her lifetime, but as it appears that the estate was solvent, and the regular course of business is presumed to have been followed, it may perhaps be assumed that she did receive the income during her life. At all events the facts alleged show that she did have full knowledge of the provisions of her husband's will, and of the fact that it had been duly admitted to probate. It is not alleged that she did not also have full knowledge of all of the alleged gifts by her husband to the defendants. The allegations show that she did have full knowledge of a large part of them. The fourth clause of his will, above quoted, certainly put her on inquiry as to all of them. It is alleged that she caused an inquiry to be made concerning them. In this condition of her affairs she proceeded, on August 16, 1909, seven months after the probate of her deceased husband's will, to make and execute her own will. The second clause declares: "I hereby give, devise and bequeath all of my estate, of every kind and description" to the three children, Claus A., Rudolph and Emma C., plaintiffs herein. This would include her inherited one half of the community property and, in addition, all the income from the other half which would accrue to her up to the time of her own death. It would also, if taken alone, carry the right she would have to avoid or acquiesce in the gifts made by her husband in his lifetime without her written consent, if such right survived, and if she did not otherwise dispose of or exercise such right. With respect to those gifts she then declared as follows:

"Fourth. I intentionally omit making any provision in this will for my sons, John D. Spreckels and Adolph B. Spreckels and I intentionally omit to make any provision therein for the issue of either of my said sons, in case either of my said sons shall die before my death, because I do not desire my said two sons or any of their issue to take any part of my estate. This I do for the reason that my deceased husband, Claus Spreckels, prior to his death, had already given and advanced to my said sons a large part of his estate, and for other reasons satisfactory to me."

The words "I hereby give all my estate, of every kind and description" to the three other children, excluded John and Adolph from participation in her estate. At that time, and up to her death, they held the property given to them by their father out of the community property. He had declared in his will that because of these gifts he gave them none of the remaining property. He thereby, in effect, declared, as a part of his last will, that they were to keep and hold all of the property he had given to them. Knowing this, and because of this disposition by him of a part of the community property, in effect because they already had the whole of that part, not a half interest only, she declared that she intentionally omitted to give them any share in the remainder disposable by her. The declaration is entirely inconsistent with the existence of a purpose, desire, or intention on her part that her executors or the beneficiaries under her will should have the right to recover a half of that which she says had been "given and advanced" to them. The provision, in connection with the circumstances under which it was made, precludes all idea that she regarded the property so given to the two defendants, or any part thereof or right in regard thereto, as any part of her descendible estate, or that the other three children were to receive, by her will or otherwise, any claim to that property or right to an accounting thereof. It was equivalent to an express ratification and confirmation of said gifts, and it was a consent thereto, by her, in writing, advisedly made. This will she retained unrevoked until her death, showing that notwithstanding her alleged direction to the plaintiff, Claus A. Spreckels, soon after the death of her husband, to begin an action to recover the property so given to John and Adolph, her last and final wish and will was that they should retain it all, but should receive nothing from her.

The plaintiffs have endeavored to avoid these consequences, and prevent consideration of her testamentary confirmation of the gifts, by alleging that Anna C. Spreckles "did not, at any time during her life, consent in writing or otherwise to said gifts." The respective wills of Claus Spreckels and Anna C. Spreckels, both of which are alleged to have been duly probated, are, however, incorporated into the complaint as parts thereof. This renders the aforesaid allegation inoperative, so far as it is inconsistent with the terms of her will. When applied to the will which it is alleged she made, the allegation amounts to no more than the conclusion of the pleader that the provision of the will did not constitute a consent to the gifts, or a confirmation thereof. In our opinion they were both a consent in writing and a ratification and confirmation, and they effectually contradict and nullify the above allegation.

Upon this view of the case it is immaterial whether the gifts to John and Adolph were or were not made to prevent the wife from receiving one-half of the community property of said marriage, or with the design of excluding the other children from ultimate participation, by will or inheritance from her, in any part thereof. It is also unnecessary to consider the question whether or not the right of the widow to attack or avoid those gifts survived her death and passed to the executors of her will, or to those to whom she devised and bequeathed her estate. During her lifetime she was the only person who had the right to gainsay these gifts. Her power in that respect was complete, so far as others were concerned, and her ratification and confirmation thereof by her will concluded all other persons, regardless of the motive that prompted the gifts or of the nature of her right to avoid them.

The judgment is affirmed.

(S. F. 6692.)(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1916.

OF PARTIES PLAINTIFF.

Where certain persons were parties plaintiff to an action when it was begun, but they were omitted as parties plaintiff from the second amended complaint, the omission of their names worked a discontinuance of the action so far as they were concerned, equivalent to a voluntary dismissal, entitling defendants to judgment that they take nothing and for costs against them, a judgment not rendered erroneous because not immediately entered, but only upon final determination of the case, being included in the judgment against the other plaintiffs.

Action by Claus A. Spreckels and Rudolph Spreckels as executors of the last will and testament of Anna C. Spreckels, deceased, against Adolph B. Spreckels and John D. Spreckels. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Judgment affirmed.

Charles S. Wheeler, John F. Bowie, and Cushing & Cushing, all of San Francisco (Nathan M. Moran, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, for respondents. A. A. Moore and Stanley Moore, both of San Francisco, amici curiae.

SHAW, J. In the original complaint filed in this case, the persons named as plaintiffs were Claus A. Spreckels and Rudolph Spreckels, as executors of the will of Anna C. Spreckels, deceased, and Emma C. Ferris, Claus A. Spreckels, and Rudolph Spreckels, as individuals. Afterward, by leave of court a second amended complaint was filed, in which the only persons named as plaintiffs were Claus A. Spreckels and Rudolph Spreckels as executors of the will of Anna C. Spreckels, deceased. The individual plaintiffs were omitted. A demurrer to the second amended complaint was sustained, and judgment was directed to be entered in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiffs. Thereupon judgment was made and entered that Claus A. Spreckels and Rudolph Spreckels, as executors of the will of Anna C. Spreckels, deceased, Emma C. Ferris, Claus A. Spreckels, and Rudolph Spreckels take nothing by the said action, and that defendants recover of said plaintiffs for the defendants' costs amounting to $5.25. This is the same action as that involved in case No. 6756, Spreckels v. Spreckels, 158 Pac. 542, this day decided. Claus A. Spreckels, Rudolph Spreckels, and Emma C. Ferris appeal from this judgment against them as individuals, claiming that as they were not parties to the action as individuals when the second amended complaint was filed and when the demurrer thereto was sustained, there was no authority to give judgment against them for the defendants' costs.

The judgment was not erroneous. They were parties plaintiff to the action when it was begun. It does not appear how the second amended complaint came to be filed, or why they were not made parties plaintiff therein. But the omission of their names worked a discontinuance of the action, so far as they were personally concerned, which is equivalent to a voluntary dismissal, and entitled the defendants to a judgment that they take nothing and for costs against them. The fact that such judgment was not immediately entered, but awaited the final determination of the case and was included in the judgment against the other plaintiffs does not render it erroneous.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLAXTON v. AMERICAN CASUALTY CO.
(Civ. 1816.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 15, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 13, 1916.)

INSURANCE — 528—ACCIDENT POLICY—TIME OF "LOSS"—"DISABILITY."

Under an accident policy which, as shown by its heading, provides indemnity for loss of life, limb, sight, or time by accidental means, and loss of time by sickness, and in its body provides that for certain losses certain amounts shall be payable, as for loss of one eye $2,500, and provides that if such bodily injury alone shall directly, immediately, and continuously disable insured from the duties of his business, and during the period of such total disability shall result in any of the losses specified, he shall be paid the sum provided for such "loss," and in addition the weekly indemnity for "disability," while "disability" must immediately follow an injury that the weekly indemnity therefor may be had, loss of an eye need not immediately follow the accident that the lump sum payable therefor may be recoverable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Ernest Claxton against the American Casualty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Sharpstein, of San Francisco, for appellant. McClanahan & Derby, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action for the recovery of an amount alleged to be due upon an accident insurance policy for the loss of an eye. The only question presented is as to whether the complaint states a cause of action.

The complaint sets forth the policy of insurance in full, and then proceeded to aver that while it was in effect the plaintiff suffered an accidental injury to one of his eyes which for several days thereafter seemed trivial and did not give him much concern, but which gradually developed into a cataract which destroyed the sight of his eye. The policy of insurance, as shown by its heading—

"provides indemnity for loss of life, limb, sight or time by accidental means, and loss of time by sickness to the extent herein provided."

In the body of the policy there is a provision that for the loss of both eyes the sum of $5,000, and for the loss of one eye the sum of $2,500 shall be payable. The policy also contains the following clause:

"Part I.—If such bodily injury alone shall, directly and independently of all other causes, immediately, continuously and totally disable and prevent the insured from performing any and every kind of duty pertaining to his business or occupation, and if during the period of such continuous and total disability shall result in any one of the losses specified in part I hereof, the company will pay the sum specified for such loss, and in addition will pay the weekly indemnity as provided in part II from the date of the accident to the date of such loss."

There are other clauses in the policy providing that for total disability the sum of $25 per week shall be payable during the period of such continuous total disability not resulting in total loss, and that for partial disability a gradual payment shall be made depending upon the extent of the disability for a period not exceeding 52 consecutive weeks. It is the contention of the appellant that the provision of the policy above quoted in hæc verba limits the liability of the defendant to cases where the accident "immediately and continuously" disables and prevents the insured from performing the duties pertaining to his business or occupation, and that since in this case the complaint shows affirmatively that the accident and injury did not immediately or continuously cause the total loss of sight in the plaintiff's injured eye, he cannot recover under the provisions of his policy, and hence that his complaint did not state a cause of action. We cannot give our assent to such a narrow and limited interpretation of this insurance policy. Read as a whole, it is evident that it was intended to provide for two modes of indemnity to injured policy holders: One, the payment of a stipulated sum for the loss of an eye; the other an indemnity in the form of weekly benefits to be paid the injured person during the period of his inability to attend to his business or occupation, resulting from the injury and extending from the date of such injury to the date of the loss of the injured member. So construed, the terms of this policy are reasonable and consistent; while, on the other hand, to give the quoted clause the meaning which the appellant claims for it would be to limit the operation of the policy to cases where the accident was so severe as to immediately and continuously deprive the insured of the sight of his eye, and thus practically immediately create the loss. The use of the words "in addition" in the quoted passage clearly indicates the distinction to be observed between the terms "disability" and "loss" in this policy, and also serves to show that the intended scope of said provision was to define the conditions under which disability benefits would be payable, but not to prescribe the condition under which the lump sum payable for the loss of the plaintiff's eye should be due.

It follows from this broader and more reasonable and consistent construction of the policy that the complaint states a cause of action.

Judgment affirmed.

ANDERSON v. MONTICELLO S. S. CO.
(Civ. 1640.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 27, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT — 101, 102(1) — MASTER'S LIABILITY — TOOLS AND APPLIANCES.

It is the master's duty to furnish reasonably safe and suitable appliances for the use of his employes in the particular service in which they are engaged, and to keep such appliances in a reasonable state of repair.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 135, 171, 178, 179; Dec. Dig. —101, 102(1).]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT — 120 — ASSUMPTION OF RISK—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

A seaman on defendant's vessel did not assume the risk of personal injury from the part of a spike projecting from the end of a heaving line, which was thrown to him from the vessel, where the nature of such defect and the danger of its use were not obvious.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. —120.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT — 120 — ASSUMPTION OF RISK—DISCOVERY.

He did not assume the risk, where he had never in fact been called upon to perform the particular duty which either required its use by himself, or exposed him to the danger incident to the use of such heaving line by others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. —120.]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT — 235(13)—MASTER'S LIABILITY—TOOLS AND APPLIANCES—KNOWLEDGE.

A heaving line upon a vessel used in making landings and to draw the hawser to a wharf, often in the nighttime, performed an essential function in the operation of docking the vessel, and was not in the nature of a small appliance, as to the condition of which, from its familiar use, a seaman knew more than the owner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 718; Dec. Dig. —235(13).]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT — 235(7) — TOOLS AND APPLIANCES—INSPECTION.

Where the defect and danger in a heaving line were inherent in its construction by reason of a projecting spike at the end of the line, present at the time of a seaman's employment, and which were not increased or diminished by use or by inspection, a seaman to whom the line was thrown, though he might have discovered the defect by proper inspection, was not bound to do so.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR — 1011(1)—FINDING—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The trial court's finding on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Albert Anderson against the Monticello Steamship Company. Judgment for plaintiff, new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Raymond Benjamin and Stanley Moore, both of San Francisco, for appellant. H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and order denying a new trial.

The plaintiff was a sailor employed on a vessel of the defendant, named Arrow, carrying freight and passengers between San Francisco and Vallejo. The plaintiff entered upon this employment on February 5, 1911. On the night of March 12, 1911, he was sent ashore at Vallejo for the purpose of catching a heaving line to be thrown to him from the vessel, and which was attached to the hawser with which it was about to be moored at the defendant's wharf. The end of the heaving line which was to be cast ashore had in it an iron or steel spike about a quarter of an inch in diameter and about 6 inches long, around which the rope was wound and knotted in such a manner as to leave a small portion of the sharp end of the spike exposed. When the plaintiff had gone ashore, and had signified to one of his fellow employes on the vessel as to about where he was, the line was thrown in his direction, when the end of it, in which was this spike, struck the plaintiff; the sharp point of the spike penetrating one of his eyes and destroying the sight thereof. The evidence in the case disclosed that this particular heaving line was a part of the equipment of the vessel at the time the defendant's employment began, but that he had never seen or used it before; this being the first time he had been called upon to perform the particular duty in the course of which he was injured.

The plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $1,621 and his costs, and from such judgment and the order denying a new trial the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The evidence in the case discloses that it was the custom of the defendant from time to time to have its heaving lines made up as needed; the work of preparing them for use being done by the sailors under the direction of the master. The evidence also sufficiently discloses, and the court found, that the heaving line with which the plaintiff was struck and injured was not a reasonably safe or suitable appliance for the purpose for which it was used; that while the ends of heaving lines, which are to be thrown ashore in the direction where the sailor who is to catch or lay hold of them is supposed to be standing, have their heaving end sometimes weighted with bags of sand, or knots made out of their own material, or even with pieces of lead completely inclosed within the folds of such knots, such lines so prepared are reasonably harmless, while the particular line used on this occasion, and having in its heaving end the exposed sharp point of an iron or steel spike, was unusual and dangerous to any person liable to be struck by it in the course of heaving it ashore. The evidence also shows that heaving lines are a part of the appliances usually furnished by the owners of such vessels for the use of their employés, and that this particular heaving line was one of such appliances furnished by the defendant to the plaintiff and his fellow employés at the time they entered its service.

[1] It is no longer necessary to cite authorities to the proposition that it is the duty of the employer to furnish reasonably safe and suitable appliances for the use of his employés in the particular service in which they are engaged, and to keep such appliances in a reasonable state of repair. The first of these duties was not done by the defendant in the case at bar. Whatever may have been the custom of having its heaving lines made up from time to time by the members of the vessel's crew from larger coils of rope supplied them for that purpose, the defendant can derive no comfort from it in this case, since the undisputed evidence shows that this particular heaving line was not made up, either by the plaintiff or by any of his fellow employés, but was furnished by the appellant to them at the time of their employment.

[2, 3] Neither can it be contended that the plaintiff assumed the risk incident to this appliance, for two reasons: First, the nature of its defect and danger of its use were not obvious; second, the plaintiff had never in fact been called upon to perform the particular duty, which either required the use by himself, or exposed him to the danger incident to the use by others, of this heaving line. The rule declared in the case of Silveira v. Iversen, 128 Cal. 187, 60 Pac. 687, is applicable to the facts of this case:

"The employé is not required to use any degree of care or diligence to discover defects; he will be held to have assumed the risk only where he knew, and will be held to have known only when the defect was so obvious that he must have known or simply refused to open his eyes and see, or when he was put upon inquiry by some discovery or suggestion of danger which was gross negligence for him to neglect."

And in the case of Magee v. North Pacific Coast R. R. Co., 78 Cal. 430, 437, 21 Pac. 114, 115 (12 Am. St. Rep. 69) the court says:

"It has been often said that the master is not liable for defects in such things to a servant whose means of knowledge thereof were equal to those of the master. But this is an erroneous statement. The master has no right to assume that the servant will use such means of knowledge, because it is not part of the duty of the servant to inquire into the sufficiency of these things. The servant has a right to rely upon the master's inquiry, because it is the master's duty so to inquire; and the servant may justly assume that all these things are fit and suitable for the use which he is directed to make of them."

[4] The appellant undertakes to avoid the application of these principles to the case at bar by the contention that this heaving line was in the nature of a small appliance, such as the minor tools of an employment, about the condition of which from their familiar use the employé knows more than the employer; but the evidence does not sustain this view. There were several of these heaving lines upon the vessel, but they were in use only when making landings, and that often at night, as in the case at bar. Moreover, they performed an essential function in the operation of bringing a vessel to the dock, and in their way were as important an appliance as the hawser itself.

[5] Considerable space is devoted in the briefs of respective counsel to the discussion of the duty of inspection resting upon the defendant in the case at bar; but we do not deem this subject germane to the question before us, for the reason that the nature of the appliance was such that its defect and danger were inherent in its construction, and were present at the time of the plaintiff's employment, and would not be increased or diminished by use, and while these might have been discovered by a proper inspection on the part of the defendant, its original negligence in supplying the defective and dangerous appliance would not be either added to or lessened by making or omitting an inspection.

[6] The final contention of the appellant is that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence at the time of the accident by coming out from behind a pier where he had been standing at the moment the heaving line was thrown. But upon this subject the evidence is conflicting, and the finding of the trial court will not for that reason be disturbed.

We are of the opinion, also, that the evidence as a whole is sufficient to sustain the findings and conclusions of the court, and we discover no error which would justify a reversal of the case.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PETERSON v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR BUTTE COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1534.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1916.)

JUDGMENT $\S$ 153(3) — DEFAULT JUDGMENT — SETTING ASIDE — TIME OF APPLICATION — WAIVER OF NOTICE OF ENTRY.

Relative to running of the 10 days after notice of entry of default judgment, within which Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 859, requires application for relief from the judgment to be made, and called up for action thereon, notice of entry of such judgment, which section 893, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1441, requires to be in writing, is not waived by mere preparation of supporting affidavits, but only by the filing of the application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 300 ; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 153(3).]

Petition by Gunnard Peterson for certiorari to the superior court, in and for the County of Butte, and Hon. H. D. Gregory, judge thereof. Demurrer to petition sustained, and order to show cause discharged.

King & King, of Chico, for petitioner. J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for respondents.

HART, J. Certiorari. The petition shows: That, on the 8th day of December, 1915, the petitioner instituted an action in the justice's court of Nelson township, Butte county, against W. B. Linn and William Utter, copartners engaged in business under the firm name and style of Linn & Utter, for the recovery of the sum of \$230, alleged to be a balance remaining due on two promissory notes, together with costs of suit, including attorney's fees, as provided in said notes. On the same day, upon an affidavit filed for that purpose, a writ of attachment was issued, and the same levied upon property belonging to the defendant, Utter. On the 14th day of December, 1915, the defendants were each served with summons, together with a copy of the complaint, at Chico, in Butte county, and the constable serving the same made due return of such service on the 16th day of December, 1915. On the 16th day of December, 1915, an undertaking for the release of the attachment was filed in the sum of \$647.02. On January 3d, the defendants having failed to answer or demur to the complaint within legal time, a default judgment was entered against them for the amount sued for and costs. On January 15, 1916, J. Oscar Goldstein, attorney for the defendants, filed and served notice of a motion to set aside the judgment so entered, on the ground that the same had been taken against the defendants through their "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect." Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 859. Said notice fixed the time for the hearing of said motion for the 25th day of January, 1916, or 10 days from the date of the filing and service of the notice. On the day last mentioned the motion was heard and the justice denied the same, and so refused to set aside and vacate the default judgment entered against the defendants. Thereafter (February 2, 1916), the defendants took an appeal to the superior court from the order of said justice, refusing to open up the default, the appeal being on questions of law only. On the 21st day of February, 1916, the appeal was heard and, on the 24th day of that month, the superior court made the following order in the cause:

"The clerk of this court is directed to enter an order sustaining the motion of the defendants to return this cause to the justice's court of Nelson township, with directions to the justice of said court to set aside the default judgment and permit the defendants to file their answers and proper pleas to plaintiff's action against them. The defendants are entitled to recover their costs in this court on this appeal."

It is the foregoing order which the petitioner by this proceeding asks to have annulled and vacated on the ground that the superior court was without jurisdiction to make it. The contention is that the application by the defendants to be relieved from the judgment entered against them by default by the justice of the peace was not made within the time prescribed by section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section reads, in part:

" * * * The court may also, on such terms as may be just, and on payment of costs, relieve a party from a judgment by default taken against him by his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, but the application for such relief must be made within ten days after notice of the entry of the judgment and upon an affidavit showing good cause therefor."

The Supreme Court has held that where an application for relief under section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure is made it must not only be filed, but must be called up for action thereon by the court, and the court moved to grant it within 10 days after notice of the decision has been served on the losing party. Spencer v. Branham, 109 Cal. 336, 41 Pac. 1095; People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645.

The application to the justice of the peace to set aside and vacate the default judgment was supported and resisted by affidavits filed by the respective parties, which, presumptively, were among the papers and documents used on the appeal to the superior court. Code Civ. Proc. § 975. The salient facts leading to this controversy and upon which the determination of the question submitted here depends are not disputed. It is, indeed, conceded that the defendants were not served with the written notice of the entry of the judgment against them by default required by section 893 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by the Legislature of 1915. Stats. 1915, p. 1441. It is claimed, however, that the fact of the preparation of the affidavits by which the defendants supported their application to be relieved from the default judgment constituted an unequivocal act of waiver of notice of the entry of said judgment, and that therefore the time within which the defendants were required to apply and move for an order setting aside the default began to run from the dates of said affidavits. These affidavits were made on the 13th and 14th days of January, 1916, or 11 and 12 days, respectively, prior to the date fixed in the notice of motion to vacate the default for the hearing of said motion, viz., the 25th day of January, 1916, and, obviously, if the time of the mere formulation or preparation of the affidavits constituted an act involving a waiver of notice of the entry of the judgment, then the time for application for relief under section 859 would, at the time of the preparation and execution of the affidavits, begin to run, and the defendants would therefore be without a remedy and the respondents without jurisdiction to make the order complained of. If, on the other hand, waiver did not take place until the filing of the application in the justice's court, as is the theory of the respondents, then the defendants were within time, and the jurisdiction of the respondents to make the order assailed here is unimpeachable.

It is a settled rule that where the statute requires notice to be given a party of any action of a court in any proceeding, the notice so given must be precisely the one prescribed by the statute. Prior to the amendment of section 893 of the Code of Civil Procedure by the Legislature of 1915, it was held that where, under various provisions of our Code, notice of a decision is required to be given, written notice is usually intended. Forni v. Yoell, 99 Cal. 176, 33 Pac. 887, citing section 1010, Code Civ. Proc. Under the amendment of section 893, however, it is now imperatively required. But "any one may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his benefit * * *" (Civ. Code, § 3513), and, accordingly, notice of a decision of a court may be waived. But, as is said, in Forni v. Yoell, supra, "the evidence of a waiver which deprives a party of a positive right granted him by law should be of such a positive and conclusive character as to leave no rational doubt." Likewise, in Gard- ner v. Stare, 135 Cal. 118, 67 Pac. 5, the court expresses itself. It is there said:

"The evidence of such waiver must be clear and uncontradicted—not dependent upon oral testimony or ex parte affidavits."

It is further said therein:

"A written admission by the party entitled to notice, of knowledge that the decision had been made, filed with the clerk or entered upon the minutes of the court, would supersede the necessity of giving such notice; and a motion to the court or other proceeding by a party, with reference to the decision, which presumes his knowledge that it has been made, and by which he seeks to protect his own interest against the rights of the other party under the decision, will be regarded as a waiver of his right to a notice of the decision."

Again, in Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 61 Pac. 1123, it is said:

"The rule would therefore seem to be that written notice of filing of decision is in all cases required, unless waived by facts appearing in the records, files, or minutes of the court."

In this case, J. Oscar Goldstein, attorney for the defendants, in his affidavit filed in the justice's court in support of the motion to vacate the judgment, declared that the first intimation he received of the entry of the judgment on the default of the defendants was on the 10th day of January, 1916. On that day, he likewise declared, he met in Oroville one of the attorneys of the petitioner, and by her was informed that the judgment had been entered on the 3d day of January, 1916; that, upon his return to his home at Chico, he conveyed to the defendants the information so obtained by him. As before stated, the defendants had not been regularly served with notice of the decision or the entry of the judgment, and in their affidavits each deposed that he was much surprised upon being told by their attorney that a default judgment had been entered against them. It is perfectly clear that the information obtained by Goldstein and the defendants of the entry of the judgment cannot be held to have amounted to the transmission to them of actual knowledge of the entry of said judgment. The information was the result of a mere hearsay statement, and, while it was doubtless sufficient to put the parties on their guard or to start them on an investigation which would lead to actual knowledge of the fact of the entry of the judgment, it did not, as stated, constitute actual knowledge. Nor did the mere preparation and verification of the affidavits by which the defendants intended to support their motion to vacate the judgment upon such information involve a waiver of notice of the entry of the judgment. The mere preparation and verification of the affidavits did not constitute "a written admission" of knowledge, nor a "motion to the court or other proceeding with reference to the decision, which presumed knowledge that the decision had been made." The only motion or proceeding from which knowledge by the defendants of the entry of judgment may be presumed was the motion or application to be relieved from the default. And it was only when that application was filed that the waiver occurred, and consequently the time within which the defendants were required to make their motion and ask the action of the court thereon began to run from the date of the filing of said application. It results, of course, that the defendants were within legal time in the presentation of their application for relief under the terms of section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the superior court, in making the order attacked by this proceeding, acted within the sphere of its lawful jurisdiction.

The demurrer, which was interposed by the respondents to the petition, is accordingly sustained, and the order to show cause discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Claus A. Spreckels and others against the State. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco, and Robert A. Warring, of Sacramento, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Albert H. Elliott, of San Francisco, for the State. Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. Shortly prior to her death, Anna C. Spreckels, the mother of the plaintiffs, made to the latter gifts of certain corporate stock. The defendant claimed, as it still claims, that the gifts were made in contemplation of the death of the donor and to take effect after that event, and that therefore the transfers were and are subject to taxation under and by virtue of the provisions of the statute known as the inheritance tax law. This action was instituted by the plaintiffs for the purpose of obtaining a decree quieting their title to the property involved in the said transfer as against the said claim of the defendant. Findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiffs, and the appeal here is by the defendant from said judgment.

On the 26th day of December, 1908, Claus Spreckels, a California pioneer and a San Francisco citizen of note and enormous wealth, died testate, in the city of San Francisco, leaving a vast amount of real and personal property, moneys, mortgages, and bonds. Surviving him were his widow, Anna C. Spreckels, and five children, among the latter the plaintiffs herein, all said children being the issue of said deceased and said Anna C. Spreckels. The entire estate left by the deceased belonged to the community.

On the 31st day of July, 1909, articles of incorporation of a corporation designated and named “San Christina Investment Company” were filed in the office of the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco; Mrs. Spreckels having caused the said corporation to be organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California. The general purposes of said corporation, as the same are stated in its articles, were to acquire, sell, and deal generally in real estate, to build upon and otherwise improve the same, and to carry on and do all things necessary for the profitable management of said properties for any purpose or purposes to which they might be put, and to buy, sell, pledge, and generally deal in stock, bonds, and obligations of corporations public or private “and personal property of any kind.” The special motive prompting Mrs. Spreckels to organize said corporation was to employ it as an instrumentality for properly conserving, handling, and managing with profit her vast and varied property interests, and to transfer all said interests in the form of stock to the plaintiffs herein.

On the 14th day of September, 1909, in pursuance of a petition previously filed therefor, the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, sitting in probate, made and entered its decree of partial distribution of the estate of the said Claus Spreckels, deceased, whereby it distributed to the widow, Anna C. Spreckels, her community share thereof. On the 8th day of November, 1909, “said Anna C. Spreckels made, executed, and delivered to said San Christina Investment Company a deed wherein and whereby she conveyed to said corporation all the real property so distributed to her by said decree of partial distribution, and other real property situate in the state of California, but no personal property whatsoever. * * * That thereafter, to wit, the 19th day of January, 1910, said Anna C. Spreckels transferred and conveyed to said San Christina Investment Company certain personal property situate within the state of California, being part of the personal property distributed to her under said decree of partial distribution aforesaid, and other personal property. That said deed so delivered on November 8, 1909, was delivered to said San Christina Investment Company in consideration of 35,000 shares of the capital stock of said corporation then issued to Anna C. Spreckels therefor, and said transfer and conveyance of January 19, 1910, was made to said corporation in consideration of 14,997 shares of the capital stock of said corporation then issued to said Anna C. Spreckels. That, except as in this paragraph of these findings set forth, no conveyance or transfer of real or personal property was at any time made by said Anna C. Spreckels to said San Christina Investment Company; that thereafter, and on the 20th day of January, 1910, said Anna C. Spreckels delivered all of said shares of stock of said San Christina Investment Company so received by her as in these findings set forth, except 3 shares thereof, to these plaintiffs as a gift, all as set forth in paragraph II of these findings. That said shares so given to plaintiffs are not and were not all the issued shares of said corporation, but are and were all of said issued shares except 6 other shares, and were at the time of said gift evidenced by a single certificate of said corporation issued to said Anna C. Spreckels on the 19th day of January, 1910, for said 49,994 shares, the same being a portion of the shares issued to said Anna C. Spreckels as aforesaid, and being the same shares referred to in paragraph II of these findings.

On the 15th day of February, 1910—less than one month after making the gifts in question—Mrs. Spreckels passed away. She was then a few months beyond the age of 79 years. For many years prior to her death she had suffered from chronic heart trouble, technically called "myocardiac disease."

The answer alleges, upon information and belief, that Mrs. Spreckels filed the petition for partial distribution of the estate of her deceased husband, Claus Spreckels, and so sought and obtained a decree of partial distribution of said estate to be made to her, and thereafter transferred all her properties to the San Christina Investment Company, and thereupon—

"caused certificates for the capital stock thereof to be issued and delivered to the plaintiffs herein as hereinbefore alleged in contemplation of her death, and that the said conveyances and transfers were intended to take effect in possession and enjoyment as to the grantees and transferees therein named, the plaintiffs herein, after her death."

As before indicated, the defendant's claim of right to the payment of a tax upon the properties involved in the gifts above described is based upon section 1 of the statute passed by the Legislature of 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 341), commonly known and referred to as the "Inheritance Tax Law."

So much of said section 1 of the inheritance tax law as is material to the solution of the ultimate question presented by this appeal reads:

"All property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state, from any person who may die seized or possessed of the same while a resident of this state, or if such decedent was not a resident of this state at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this state, or any interest therein, or income therefrom, which shall be transferred by deed, grant, sale, or gift, made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor or bargainor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death, to any person or persons, * * * shall be and is subject to a tax. * * *"

The court found as follows:

"That said Anna C. Spreckels did not cause said petition for partial distribution of the assets of the estate of said Claus Spreckels deceased, to be made and filed, or made, or filed, in her behalf, or said decree or partial distribution thereof to be made to her, or make, execute, and deliver, or make, or execute, or deliver said deed to said San Christina Investment Company, or transfer or convey said personal property or any part thereof to said last-named company, or cause said certificates of capital stock therein, or any certificate of capital stock, or any share of capital stock in said San Christina Investment Company, to be issued and delivered, or issued, or delivered, to plaintiffs herein or any thereof, or at all, in contemplation of her death, and neither the said acts aforesaid nor any thereof were made or done by her in contemplation of her death."

The court further found that:

The transfers above referred to were not, nor any thereof, intended to take effect in possession and enjoyment or in possession or enjoyment, as to the grantees or transferees therein named (the plaintiffs herein) or either or any thereof, after the death of Mrs. Spreckels, "but each and all of said conveyances, transfers and said gifts were intended to and did take effect in all and every respect and for every purpose, immediately upon the making thereof, respectively, and prior to her death."

It is also found that six shares of stock in the said investment company were given and transferred by Mrs. Spreckels to other persons or corporations, but were not so given and transferred in contemplation of her death, nor the enjoyment and possession of the same intended to be or were postponed until after her death, but that the gift and transfer of said six shares was absolute, and that the transferees thereof, as was true of the plaintiffs with respect to the above-mentioned gifts and transfers to them, immediately and prior to the death of Mrs. Spreckels entered into the possession and enjoyment of said property in each and every respect and for every purpose.

It is obvious that the punctum saliens of this controversy is whether the gifts of Mrs. Spreckels to the plaintiffs were made in contemplation of her death within the meaning of the legislative intent of the above section, or made with the intention that they were to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death; and it is equally obvious that the questions whether the gifts herein in controversy were made by the donor "in contemplation of death," within the meaning of the law, and such transfers were "intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment aft-

There is no ground or reason arising in the evidence for doubting that Mrs. Spreckels intended that the gifts or transfers in question were to take effect immediately upon the execution thereof, that the donees were to enter into immediate possession and enjoyment of the properties or stock so transferred and before her death, and that said donees (the plaintiffs) did, immediately upon the execution of the gifts and before the death of Mrs. Spreckels, enter into the possession and enjoyment of said properties. Indeed, the evidence upon this phase of the controversy stands in the record undisputed, and therefore, so far as this record is concerned, is conclusive upon that point. It follows that the only question here is whether the gifts were made in contemplation of the death of the donor within the true intent and contemplation of the statute. We are convinced that the finding that the gifts in controversy were not so made is sufficiently fortified by the evidence to preclude any just interference therewith by this court.

[1] First, it will be well to inquire into the legislative meaning and scope of the language "in contemplation of death," as that phrase is used in the statute. It certainly cannot justly be held that the purpose or the intention of the Legislature was, by the law in question, to subject every transfer of property by gift to the burden of the inheritance tax. Obviously (in other words) the language referred to was not intended to include that general expectation of death which is the essential concomitant of the inherent knowledge of the inevitable termination of all life, and which is in the young and the physically robust as well as in the aged and the infirm. No similar statute has been so construed. A reasonable and just view of the law in question is that it is only where the transfer of property by gift is immediately and directly prompted by the expectation of death that the property so transferred becomes amenable to the burden; or, as counsel for the respondents with singular aptness states the proposition:

"It is only when contemplation of death is the motive without which the conveyance would not be made that a transfer may be subjected to the tax."

That is, the expectation of death must be the direct, specific, and immediate animating cause of the transfer; or, as the proposition is perhaps the more lucidly explained as follows in Ross on Inheritance Taxation, § 117, referring to the words "in contemplation of death," as they are used in statutes authorizing the subjection of property transferred by gift to the burdens of an inheritance tax:

"They are intended to cover transfers of persons who are prompted to act by reason of the expectation of death and who thereby accomplish transmissions of property in the nature of testamentary dispositions. The words do not refer to that general expectation commonly entertained by all persons, but rather to that apprehension which arises from some existing condition of body or some impending peril."

Again, in Andrews on the Transfer Tax Law of New York, p. 172, it is said:

"The statute was evidently intended to reach absolute transfers of property when made under certain conditions, viz., when the transferrer was contemplating death. That is, the thought of death has taken so firm a hold on his mind as to control and dictate his actions regarding his property, and the business is transacted while contemplating death and considering what conditions would arise or exist in the event of death without making the transfer, or, to be more specific, the contemplation of death is the sole motive and cause of the transfer; * * * but, if made with other motives and for other causes, it is not taxable, no matter when made, as it cannot be presumed that the Legislature intended to place any limitation upon the inherent right of a person to give away his property whenever, and to whomsoever, he desires."

The views thus expressed upon the meaning of the words referred to are in harmony with those to be found in all the cases. See State v. Pabst, 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351; Rosenthal v. People, 211 Ill. 309, 71 N. E. 1122; People v. Burkhalter, 247 Ill. 600, 93 N. E. 379, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351; In re Desert's Estate, 154 Wis. 320, 142 N. W. 647, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 790, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1084. And, as we understand the case of Estate of Reynolds, supra, there is no expression therein with which the views above expressed conflict. In that case Mr. Justice Henshaw criticizes the construction put upon a similar statute of the state of New York by the courts of that state, it having at first been held by those courts that a transfer of property "in contemplation of death" within the meaning of the inheritance tax law of said state meant a gift causa mortis, and that the law was "applicable to no other kinds or characters of transfers." Judge Henshaw, referring to the New York decisions, said in the Reynolds Case:

"Nothing in our law compels us to adopt the restricted construction put by the courts of New York upon their own statute, and everything in our law directs that a liberal construction should be placed upon it to the end that its provisions may be not evaded."

The Reynolds Case was decided in the year 1912 after the Legislature of 1911 had, among other changes, added the following provision to our inheritance tax law:

"The words 'contemplation of death,' as used in this act, shall be taken to include that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person on the execution of his will, and in no wise shall said words be limited and restricted to that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person in making a gift causa mortis; and it is hereby declared to be the intent and purpose of this act to tax any and all transfers which are made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of the property transferred by testate or intestate laws."

This amendment, as was said of it in the Reynolds Case, in no manner changed the law as it stood prior thereto, but its purpose and effect were merely to give a clearer expression to the legislative intent and meaning of the law or to make certain that which might otherwise have been regarded as doubtful, viz., that the intent of the Legislature was to subject to the tax all property transferred as a testamentary disposal thereof, whether such transfer was by gift inter vivos or by will and testament.

[2] With the law as we understand it thus stated, we will now take up a consideration of the evidence. In addition to the facts already narrated, the testimony shows: That Mrs. Spreckels, immediately after the death of her husband, Claus Spreckels, in the month of December, 1908, was awarded a family allowance of $5,000 per month payable out of the estate of her deceased spouse. In addition to this sum, she received out of the income of her husband's community share of the estate, in accordance with the terms of his last will, the sum of $10,000 per month; the aggregate amount of her monthly income being, obviously, the sum of $15,000.

Claus A. Spreckels, one of the plaintiffs herein, testified that shortly after his father's death his mother, Anna C. Spreckels, talked with him about forming a corporation as an instrumentality for handling her enormous properties and business interests. The organization of such a corporation for such purpose, testified the witness, wholly originated in the mind of Mrs. Spreckels herself, and without any suggestion from him regarding the proposition. Thereafter Mrs. Spreckels frequently brought the matter up in conversation with the witness and appeared to be insistent in her intention to form a corporation for the purpose indicated. She said to the witness, long before the transfer, that she was receiving, with the family allowance and the amount coming to her monthly from her deceased husband's interests, an enormous sum—in fact, a much larger sum than she could ever use—and that it was her desire and intention at that time (she said) to distribute part of her belongings to her three children, the plaintiffs. These conversations occurred in the year 1909, at which time Mrs. Spreckels was about 77 years of age. The witness proceeded to say that at no time in any of the conversations referred to did Mrs. Spreckels speak about dying or preparing for death. On the contrary (continued the witness), she frequently spoke of refurnishing her Van Ness avenue residence, which had been damaged to some extent by the 1906 fire, and which damage she had early in the year 1909 caused to be repaired, with the purpose of again occupying it as her permanent home.

She stated in said conversations and in conversations had just prior to and at about the time of the transfers in question that she intended going to Europe for the purpose of obtaining suitable furnishings for her Van Ness residence and at the same time paying a visit to her daughter, Mrs. Ferris (one of the plaintiffs herein), who was then a resident of London. The witness declared that on no occasion, when speaking of organizing the San Christina Investment Company and of giving certain of her interests to the plaintiffs, did Mrs. Spreckels say or intimate that her purpose in forming the corporation and then transferring her property to her three children was to avoid probate proceedings. She merely said on all occasions that her intention was to transfer her interests to said three children; they to take immediate possession thereof upon the consummation of the transfer.

Referring to the general state of Mrs. Spreckels' health during the year 1909, the witness said that at times she would be ill, while at other times she appeared to be in enjoyment of fairly good health. The opinion of the witness was that her death was due to the ravages of old age and a general breaking down of her physical organization.

Rudolph Spreckels, a plaintiff herein, corroborated the testimony of Claus A. Spreckels in all substantial particulars. He declared that the purpose of his mother, Mrs. Anna Spreckels, as expressed by her, in forming the San Christina Investment Company, was to transfer all her property to said company and then give said property or the stock of said corporation to the three children, the plaintiffs. She declared to the witness that she desired that said three children should receive from her said property "so that the same might be used and enjoyed by them during her lifetime." The witness continued:

"My mother at that time was receiving a substantial income from my father's estate as a family allowance by the court. She had no other source of income. She owned the Van Ness avenue house individually, and also owned a piece of property in the Hawaiian Islands. The property on Van Ness avenue and that in the Hawaiian Islands were residence properties, and were not income-producing. Under the trust clause of my father's will and from a family allowance my mother was in receipt of approximately $15,000 a month. My mother did not express any desire in her conversations with me in reference to her property to avoid the cost and delays of probate, nor did she offer any opinion in reference to attorneys and attorneys' fees. Q. Did she give any reason at all other than her wish to have you three children enjoy the fruits of this property? A. That was the entire purpose of it; I think I can say that definitely, that it was her intention at the very beginning that this was to come to the children."

The witness testified that in all his conversations with his mother relative to her property affairs and the transfer of the same to the plaintiffs she never referred to her death until about three days prior to the date of that event. On that occasion she said to the witness:

"Well, I wonder when I will be able to get up again, or if I will get up."

The witness declared that Mrs. Spreckels first became ill so that she needed the care of a physician in the month of April following the death of her husband.

"I recollect that she went to Aptos [Santa Cruz county] in the summer of 1909. I visited her there on two occasions. Up to the time that my mother was taken ill after my father's death she had always enjoyed good health. She had a strong constitution. She had been very active for her years, exceedingly so. * * * Dr. Baum succeeded Dr. Richter as the physician for my mother during her illness. I had not known Dr. Baum until that time. The change was made, I think, at the instance of my mother. She was a little impatient that she wasn't able to get out, as she was a woman who had always enjoyed good health and had a good constitution, and she thought that perhaps under other treatment she could get out more rapidly. She was restive under the doctor's treatment. Q. Did she ever express herself in that way, that she wanted to get out more rapidly? A. Yes, sir; she felt that she wanted to have more freedom of action. She didn't enjoy the diet, or matters of that sort. Q. She expected to go out? A. She did most decidedly. She anticipated, of course, going abroad. She was exceedingly anxious to be with my sister at the time of the birth of her child, which was expected in June [1910], and did actually occur on June 28th, I think; my sister's first and only child; and, of course, she was particularly anxious to be with her daughter under those circumstances. She had repeatedly spoken to me on that subject. My sister expected my mother to be with her because she left, I think, some time in January, probably within a month prior to my mother's death. Of course, that was not anticipated."

Charles S. Cushing, the attorney who prepared Mrs. Spreckels' will and who prepared the papers and initiated and completed the necessary legal steps for the formation of the San Christina Investment Company, testified in part:

"At the time the stock in question was transferred to the plaintiffs here I was a witness to the indorsement. I had a talk with Mrs. Spreckels as her attorney in reference to this transfer. She expressed no other reasons at that time for transferring the stock other than is substantially shown on the back of the certificate. She said she wanted to give it to her three children. She certainly did not mention at that time her desire to avoid the expense of probate, and she did not mention anything in connection with her own death. Nor did she mention anything regarding the avoidance of a will or anything of that kind."

Anna C. Brommer, a niece of Mrs. Spreckels, had lived with the latter and was continually her companion and confidante as to her private affairs for a period of about 14 years down and prior to the time of Mrs. Spreckels' death. This witness testified that Mrs. Spreckels often discussed her business affairs with her (the witness), and had frequently after the death of her husband spoken of forming a corporation to which she intended to transfer the bulk, if not all, of her property.

"I cannot recall," said Miss Brommer, "the first conversation I had with her about giving her property to her three children. I could not distinguish one conversation from another. The substance of these various conversation by Mrs.

Spreckels was that she had ample means for herself, and that she wished her three children to have this stock, and that she wanted to give this to them share and share alike. * * * She never stated to me as a reason for making this transfer that she wanted to avoid any possibility of contest or probate expense or anything of that kind. I knew that Mrs. Spreckels was repairing the family residence on Van Ness avenue. I assisted her in the ideas in fixing it over. It was her intention to take up her residence in that mansion. Her idea of going to Europe was to purchase the furnishings for the house. She spoke to me about that. She told me that she intended to move over to the Van Ness avenue house as soon as it was completed. She thought of going to Europe first, and then in the spring of 1910 it might be completed. She intended to go to Europe in the spring of 1910. She did not say how long she expected to stay in Europe, but expected to be with her daughter in June, and then expected to come back and take up her residence at the Van Ness avenue property. * * * Her conversations with me about her affairs were rather intimate. * * * She did not suggest that a better way of disposing of property was by deed or stock; nor did she suggest anything about avoiding probate. She never expressed herself as to lawyers and lawyers' fees. The day she transferred the stock in question she seemed more cheerful than at any other time during her illness. That would extend over the year 1909. * * * The day of the transfer of the stock in question Mrs. Spreckels came downstairs. We had a good dinner that night. She was very cheerful that day. During 1909 Mrs. Spreckels would almost every day come into the sitting-room—which was the next room to her bedroom and sit in there. There were periods though for probably a week or ten days at a time when she remained in bed. The periods in which she remained in bed occurred more frequently in the early part of 1909. She became ill in April, 1909, and in June, 1909, she was very much better, and went down to the country for two or three months, and seemed quite well, and then she was not so well about December. She had a relapse probably a week or so after January 20, 1910, and was confined to her bed. * * * Mrs. Ferris (one of the plaintiffs) was here in the latter part of 1909. She lives in England and returned there. She became the mother of a daughter there in June, 1910. That was one of the reasons why Mrs. Spreckels thought of going to Europe."

Dr. C. M. Richter, Mrs. Spreckels' physician, testified that he professionally attended her at various times from the middle of April, 1909, until the 10th day of January, 1910. Mrs. Spreckels was suffering from myocarditis, a chronic inflammation of the muscular valves of the heart, the effect of which was that "she had very irregular action of the heart and short breath, and weak feeling, troubles of circulation in all parts of the body." The doctor stated that when he was first called in to see Mrs. Spreckels:

"She had apparently had that trouble for some time before, perhaps for years. * * * During the period I attended Mrs. Spreckels she was not confined to her bed from this illness. * * * Probably from the middle of April to the middle of June, 1909, I visited her almost daily, and then she went to the country until about the middle of August, and from that time on I saw her more regularly until December and January I saw her every day. There was really no material difference in her condition in December, 1909, and January, 1910, as compared with her condition in April, 1909. It was approximately the same. * * * The treatment I prescribed was principally rest and some heart medicine and some diet. I advised a trip to the country which she took, but her condition was not materially improved by reason of this trip. I knew that she was contemplating a trip to Europe. I often spoke to her about it, and I told her she might make such a trip in the summer of 1910 without much trouble, just as she had gone to Aptos. * * * During this time she was in a condition so that she could go about the house from one room to another. She had to avoid any prolonged physical strain, because she was extremely heavy in weight. She could walk some distance, but she was careful about it."

The doctor declared that, while such an affliction as that from which Mrs. Spreckels was suffering might suddenly terminate fatally at any time, still one with that disease might live many years and finally die from some other cause.

"I did not see any reason whatever," he continued, "why she would not live for some time. * * * I should think she was in as good health on January 10, 1910, when I last saw her, as she had been during the previous months. * * * We discussed this European trip a number of times. I gave her no reason to believe that she could not take the trip. On the contrary, I advised her that she might safely take it. I saw no reason at the time I left her to anticipate a fatal termination of her illness in the immediate future, and, so far as I know, she had no reason to anticipate such a result. Q. As I understand your answers to some of my questions, they were that a person suffering from this particular kind of illness would be liable to sudden death at any time; is that right? A. Not that it would be, but could be. Q. The fact that Mrs. Spreckels was of the age of about 77 years at this time, and had suffered for many years from this illness, you would not say that those two conditions would make it probable that she could reasonably expect to die at most any time? A. No; I couldn't say that. It is our experience that such people may live for years."

The doctor further stated that he did not attend Mrs. Spreckels in her last illness; a Dr. Baum, who had died prior to the time of the trial of this action, having professionally attended her then and up to the time of her death. (The record is silent as to the specific cause of her death, so far as the opinion of a physician is concerned.)

We have now stated in substance all the testimony necessary to be considered here which was presented at the trial. Counsel for the appellant declare that no conflict arises in the testimony, but they insist, or, at any rate, the necessary effect of their position is, that the natural, and indeed the only logical, conclusion which may follow from the evidence is that Mrs. Spreckels transferred by gift the property in question in contemplation of her death, within the true sense of that language of the statute; that is to say, that the contemplation of her death was the direct and impelling motive for the transfer. In support of this position it is pointed out that Mrs. Spreckels at the time of the execution of the transfer, was a woman of venerable years, at best not far removed from the natural end of her life; that for many years prior to and up to the time of the transfer she had been a chronic sufferer from a serious and dangerous heart affliction, which was of a nature that from it her death might suddenly occur at any moment, a condition of which undoubtedly she possessed a keen realization; that, as a matter of fact, her death occurred within a few weeks after she made the transfer.

It may be conceded that the testimony thus referred to and emphasized by counsel for the appellant as supporting their theory of this case is reasonably susceptible of the inference which they vigorously contend naturally and logically follows therefrom, and, if that testimony embraced all that had been submitted to the consideration of the trial court, we might, perhaps, be able or possibly required to hold that, as a matter of law, the finding that the transfers were not made in contemplation of her death, according to the true import of that language as it is used in the law, was not sustained. But, as clearly appears from the above statement of the testimony, there is other testimony in the record which must be considered in determining the vital question presented. Briefly to recapitulate: Shortly after her husband's death, in 1908, Mrs. Spreckels expressed her intention of forming a corporation for the avowed object of transferring her property thereto. She had often declared her intention of giving her property to the plaintiffs, and to Mr. Rudolph Spreckels stated that her desire was that her children, the plaintiffs, should own and enjoy the property in her lifetime. These ideas seemed, at all times and long prior to the date of the transfers, to have constituted the central thoughts of her mind until their crystallization by the organization of the investment company, the immediate transfer of the greater part of her estate thereto, and thereupon the transfer of the stock thereof to the plaintiffs. Under the circumstances it was, without any thought of her own death, or without any view to preparation therefor, a most natural thing for her to do. At her then advanced age, having other means far more than necessary for her own maintenance for the remainder of her life, she doubtless conceived that she would in her declining days be the happier if relieved of the heavy burden and serious responsibilities which necessarily go with the control and management of vast and varied property interests, such as she was the owner and possessor of, and that, in obtaining release from these burdens, her happiness would be the more certainly assured by transferring her property to her children so that they might own and enjoy it in her own lifetime. While she was afflicted with a serious heart affection and suffered intermittent spells of illness which temporarily confined her to her bed, it is evident that she did not at any time prior to the date of the transfers harbor the thought that her life was in immediate peril from her malady, or that she would not live for many years to come. This is shown by the fact that she was in the year 1909 having her Van Ness avenue mansion repaired preparatory to her own reoccupancy of it, and by the further fact that down to the very occasion on which she transferred the stock to the plaintiffs she discussed and was contemplating a trip to Europe, not alone for the purpose of visiting her daughter and being with her at the time of the latter's expected accouchement in June, 1910, but with the further declared object of purchasing appropriate furnishings for her Van Ness avenue residence. Indeed, even during the period of her last illness she indicated a belief that she would be restored, or, at any rate, appeared not to have relinquished hope for her recovery; for, addressing Rudolph Spreckels, she said:

"I wonder when I will be able to get up again, or if I will get up."

Then there is the testimony of Dr. Richter, for a long time the family physician, who said that, while the malady with which Mrs. Spreckels was afflicted might suddenly terminate fatally at any time, it would not necessarily so terminate, and that with it she might still live very many years; she being a woman naturally of strong and robust constitution. He further testified that he advised Mrs. Spreckels that she could safely take her contemplated European trip.

From the evidence thus briefly repeated the inference is reasonable and logical that there was no thought of immediate death in Mrs. Spreckels' mind when she made the gifts in question, and that the direct and impelling motive for said transfers was not that of the contemplation of her death within the meaning of the law.

[3] Admitting, then, as counsel for the appellant point out, that there is testimony from which the opposite inference is reasonably deducible, is this court, under such a state of the record, legally justified in holding that the court below should have drawn that inference and so found in favor of the defendant? Is it within the legal province of an appellate court in a case where, as here, either of two diametrically opposing inferences, one in favor of the appellant, and the other in favor of the respondent, may justly and reasonably be drawn from the proofs, to say that, as a matter of law, the trial court should have found in favor of a particular party to the action, or in this case should have drawn that inference, of which the evidence may for the purposes of this discussion be conceded to be susceptible, which would have justified findings in favor of the appellant? The rule suggested by these questions is, it would seem, too well settled to require their restatement. We will, however, reproduce here the expressions of a few of the cases with regard to it.

In the case of Reay v. Butler, 95 Cal. 206, 214, 30 Pac. 208, it is said:

"This court can rightfully set aside a finding for want of evidence only where there is no evidence to support it, or where the supporting evidence is so slight as to show abuse of discretion."

In Dallman v. Frank, 1 Cal. App. 541, 82 Pac. 564, per Mr. Justice Harrison:

"The findings of a court, like the verdict of a jury, will be upheld in the appellate court if there is any evidence which, by reasonable construction, tends to support such findings; and in making its decision the trial court is at liberty to take into consideration, not only the testimony given at the trial, but also all inferences of fact which may be reasonably drawn from the facts established by such testimony. * * * Although the appellate court may be of the opinion that, on the evidence in the record, it would have reached a different conclusion, it is not for that reason authorized to set aside the findings of the trial court. If the evidence is such that reasonable men may reach different conclusions thereon, the findings of the trial court must be sustained."

In Huston v. Anderson, 145 Cal. 320, 78 Pac. 626, Mr. Justice (now Chief Justice) Angellotti:

"The evidence was such that it might have sustained a contrary finding, but not such as to warrant us in disturbing the finding of the court below."

There are innumerable other California cases to the same effect.

Conceding, then, that the court below could have justly concluded from the evidence that Mrs. Spreckels made the transfers in question in contemplation of her death, within the purview of the inheritance tax law, the rule stated and applied in the above cases has peculiar application to this case, since, as we have clearly shown, the evidence was such as to have reasonably warranted the conclusion arrived at therefrom by the trial court and which conclusion is evidenced by the findings upon which the judgment herein is planted. It is therefore plainly and clearly apparent that the findings here cannot, with legal propriety, be interfered with by this court.

The length of this opinion, due mainly, as will be observed, to the extended statement of the testimony which was conceived to be essential to a clear appreciation of the conclusion to which we have been led, as well as eminently proper because of the importance of the issue presented, forbids a review herein of the many cases cited by the appellant in support of the hypothesis upon which its learned counsel with singular ability have attempted to overthrow the judgment. Indeed, we have not thought it necessary to review those cases, with whose reasoning and conclusions we perceive no occasion to quarrel; for, after all, each case arising under the statute in question, as to whose meaning and intent in the particular concerned here there can be found no ground for disputation, must rest upon its own peculiar facts, and the adjudicated cases can, as a rule, do little, if any, more than to illustrate the application of the law to the particular facts of particular cases.

For the reasons herein given, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HOOPER et al. v. SMITH. (Civ. 1541.)
(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡544(1)—NECESSITY OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—DECISION ON DEMURRER.

The point that defendant was not given notice of the overruling of his demurrer to the complaint, and that therefore the clerk had no authority to enter the default judgment appealed from, cannot be considered in the absence of a bill of exceptions, as the notice, if given, would not of itself form part of the judgment roll.

2. PLEADING ⚡7—COMPLAINT—CONTINUED OWNERSHIP.

The complaint in an action on a money demand, alleging that, on a day prior to commencing the action, defendant was indebted to plaintiff, and that defendant has not paid the same or any part of it, is sufficient without an allegation that plaintiff is still the owner of the claim; there being a legal presumption of his continued ownership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. ⚡7.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by F. Hooper and another, partners as Hooper & Mayfield, against Sparrow Smith. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for appellant. Francis C. McInnis, of Fairfield, for respondents.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. The complaint in this action was filed January 20, 1915. The first paragraph thereof alleges that the plaintiff is a copartnership. The second paragraph is:

"That on the 1st day of January, 1915, the defendant, above named, was indebted to plaintiffs, above named, in the sum of five hundred and fifty dollars and 42/100 ($550.42) on an open book account for goods, groceries, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiffs, above named, to defendant, above named, between the 1st day of September, 1911, and the 31st day of August, 1914, at defendant's special instances and requests."

The third paragraph is: "That said defendant has not paid the same, nor any part thereof" and the prayer is for judgment for the amount alleged in the complaint as due.

To this complaint a demurrer was interposed by the defendant. March 22, 1915, the court made an order overruling the demurrer and giving the defendant ten days to answer the complaint. April 5, 1915, no answer having been filed, the default of the defendant was entered, and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant for the amount prayed for in the complaint was made and entered. The first paragraph of the judgment so entered reads:

"In this action the defendant, Sparrow Smith, having failed to appear and answer plaintiffs' complaint herein, and the legal time for answering having expired, and the default of said defendant in the premises having been duly entered according to law, now, at this day, on application of Francis C. McInnis, attorney for said plaintiffs, it is ordered," etc.

From the judgment as entered, the defendant has brought this appeal upon the judgment roll without any statement or bill of exceptions.

[1] In his opening brief, he states that he relies upon two points for a reversal, viz.: (1) "No notice was given of the order overruling the demurrer as required by section 476, Code of Civil Procedure, and the clerk had no authority to enter the judgment," and (2) "That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a present cause of action." Appellant's first point cannot be considered, on appeal from the judgment, in the absence of any bill of exceptions. This is clearly decided in Catanich v. Hayes, 52 Cal. 338, wherein it is stated:

"The notice of the overruling of the demurrer to the complaint, if one was given, would not of itself form a part of the judgment roll; and, if a party desires to have it appear from the judgment roll that such notice was or was not given, he may incorporate the fact in a bill of exceptions, and the bill will be included in the judgment roll. The judgment before us recites that the time allowed by the court for answering had expired; and, the record being silent as to the time allowed therefor, as well as to the giving of notice of the overruling of the demurrer, it will be presumed, in support of the judgment, that the court, before ordering entry of the judgment, had satisfactory evidence that the time for answering had expired."

As counsel for appellant in his reply brief makes the following concession—"Respondent cites authorities showing that the notice of the order overruling the demurrer is not a part of the judgment roll. This being so, the first point made by us is not well taken on this appeal"—the point need not be further discussed.

[2] Appellant's second point, that the complaint does not state a present cause of action in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant, is based upon this consideration: That the complaint was filed on the 20th day of January, 1915, and alleges that, on the 1st day of January, 1915, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiffs. Counsel's claim is that these allegations are not sufficient in a pleading to show that on January 20th the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff.

The complaint contains the further allegation: "That the defendant has not paid the same, nor any part thereof." It is clear from the language of the complaint that, on January 1, 1915, the defendant was indebted and that the plaintiffs were the owners of that indebtedness. It is equally clear that, on January 20th, the defendants were still indebted to the amount stated in the complaint, but it is appellant's claim that it is not clear that, on January 20th, the indebtedness was owned by the plaintiffs. It is suggested that, in the interim, they may have sold it to someone else and that the pleading should have negated this possibility.

Pryce v. Jordan, 69 Cal. 569, 11 Pac. 185, was an action upon a promissory note. The complaint alleged the making of the note December 15, 1878, the indorsement of the same to plaintiff July 16, 1881, and the suit was brought March 6, 1882. A demurrer to the complaint was filed, and it was contended that the complaint was insufficient because it did not show that plaintiff, since the indorsement and delivery of the note to him, had continued to be the owner and holder of it or that he was such at the commencement of the action. This is exactly the position now taken here by the appellant. Deciding the point, the court said:

"But it shows that the plaintiff acquired title to the note from the original payee by the indorsement, assignment, and delivery. As matter of law, therefore, the title to the note passed to the plaintiff, and the legal presumption is also that he continued to be and was, at the commencement of the action, the owner and holder of the note, and as such the real party in interest and entitled to sue. These legal conclusions, deducible from the facts averred in the complaint, constitute no part of the allegation of facts necessary to constitute a cause of action."

The complaint alleging the ownership of the indebtedness on January 1st by the plaintiffs, the legal presumption is that they were such owners on January 20th, and this legal conclusion need not be alleged. There are decisions holding that, in actions to recover specific property, it is necessary to allege that plaintiff was the owner at the time of bringing action, and counsel for appellant has referred to some of them in his brief. "Such an allegation or its equivalent," says the Supreme Court, in Curtin v. Kowalsky, 145 Cal. 431, 78 Pac. 962, in construing an action to recover upon a money judgment, "is required in actions to recover specific property, but not in actions to recover on money demands." Rock Ridge Park Co. v. Wells, 27 Cal. App. 281, 149 Pac. 792.

The judgment is affirmed.

MOORE v. LAUFF et al. (Civ. 1488.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1916.)

1. PARTIES $\S$ 76(4)—OBJECTION TO CAPACITY OF PLAINTIFFS—GENERAL DEMURRER—STATUTES.

Objection to the legal capacity of plaintiffs to maintain the action or sue upon the obligation pleaded cannot be raised by general demurrer, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 430, 431, providing when defendant may demur and what the demurrer must specify, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 118, 120; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 76(4); Pleading, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 436, 494.]

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION $\S$ 91(1)—ACTION BY HEIRS—JOINDER.

That the respective interests of legatees, in a note payable to decedent, had not been separated and vested in them severally by a partition of the note on distribution did not foreclose their right to join in an action to enforce the collection thereof; it being their duty, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 378, their respective several interests being undivided, to join in a suit, while, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 382, had action been instituted by one alone, the court could have required the other legatees to be joined as parties plaintiff, or even as defendants, if they refused to be joined as plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 359-361, 368, 375; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 91(1).]

3. PARTITION $\S$ 32 — RIGHT TO INSTITUTE PROCEEDINGS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1675, providing that partition may be made by commissioners appointed when the estate distributed to heirs, etc., is undivided, the proceeding is one the institution of which rests wholly on the judgment, wishes, and desires of the interested parties, who have the right, if they prefer, to hold their interests in common and undivided.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 83-86; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 32.]

4. PARTITION $\S$ 32 — PERSONS INTERESTED — DISTRIBUTION—STATUTE.

To give the superior court in probate jurisdiction, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1675, to partition undivided property distributed to heirs, devisees, etc., some interested person must, before the decree of distribution is made, file a partition for that purpose, and give legal notice thereof, pursuant to section 1676.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 83-86; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 32.]

5. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION $\S$ 91(5)—ACTION BY HEIRS—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action by distributees of the estate of a decedent on a note held by him, and distributed share and share alike by the superior court in probate to them, where the complaint declared that, by the court's final decree of distribution, the estate, including the note in suit, was distributed to the beneficiaries under the will, and that the distributees divided the property of the estate among themselves, whereby the note became the joint property of plaintiffs, such complaint sufficiently showed that plaintiffs obtained legal possession of the note which was delivered to them, and that the estate was closed and the executor discharged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 365, 372, 379; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 91(5).]

6. COSTS $\S$ 260(1) — FRIVOLOUS APPEAL — DAMAGES.

In an action on a note for $500, where it is evident that the appeal was designed to accomplish no other purpose than to delay the execution or satisfaction of the judgment, judgment will be affirmed with damages of $50 against appellant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 983, 986, 996; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 260(1).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; John L. Childs, Judge.

Action by Jonah Moore and others against O. B. Lauff and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant O. B. Lauff appeals on the judgment roll alone. Judgment affirmed, with damages awarded against appellant in the sum of $50.

Geo. W. Howe, of Crescent City, for appellant. Robert W. Miller, of Hanford, and Earl Payton, of Crescent City, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an appeal from the judgment, on the judgment roll alone, by the defendant, Lauff.

The action was on a promissory note for $500, dated February 15, 1912, which note (the complaint alleges) was made and delivered by the defendants to one S. A. Moore on the day of its date. The complaint further alleges that Moore died testate on the 8th day of March, 1912, leaving estate, among the assets of which was the note in suit; that Jonah Moore, one of the plaintiffs, was thereafter, on due proceedings, appointed executor of the estate of the deceased and letters testamentary issued to him, and that he qualified as such executor. The complaint proceeds:

"That thereafter such proceedings were had in the matter of the said estate that on the 10th day of April, 1913, there was made and entered in said superior court, in the matter of the estate of S. A. Moore, deceased, a final decree of distribution of the effects of said estate and among which effects was the said promissory note, herein declared upon, and which said note was, by said decree of distribution, distributed share and share alike to the several beneficiaries named in the said last will and testament of the said S. A. Moore, deceased. That each of the said beneficiaries, so named in said will, and to whom distribution was so made as aforesaid, had, at the time of said distribution, attained to his or her majority. That, subsequently to said decree of distribution, the several distributees partitioned and divided, equitable among themselves, the effects of the said estate so distributed; and that by said partition and division the said promissory note herein declared upon became the property of these plaintiffs jointly, and they are now the owners and holders thereof."

The complaint was unverified. The defendants interposed a general demurrer to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled, and, answering the complaint, the defendants denied that the note declared upon was, on the date mentioned or at any other time, delivered to said Moore, and denied that the plaintiffs "are now or ever were at any time whatever the owners or holders of said promissory note."

The appellant contends that the complaint does not state a cause of action and that his general demurrer should have been sustained. In purported support of this contention, he declares that the complaint is wholly wanting in the statement of a cause of action on the note sued on because it appears therefrom that, after the court made its decree of distribution, whereby the property of the estate was distributed to the several beneficiaries share and share alike, the latter being thus vested with undivided interests in common in the property, the distributees themselves "partitioned and divided the effects of the said estate so distributed," thus arrogating to themselves and exercising the right to perform an act which is solely within the power of the probate court and which "can be accomplished only by the court"; whereas, so the argument runs, to vest them with ownership of the note, so that they would be legally entitled to maintain an action thereon, it was necessary that said note, with the other assets of the estate, should first have been partitioned and the respective shares of the beneficiaries assigned to them in accordance with section 1675 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides:

"When the estate, real or personal, assigned by the decree of distribution to two or more heirs, devisees, or legatees, is in common and undivided, and the respective shares are not separated and distinguished, partition or distribution may be made by three disinterested persons, to be appointed commissioners for that purpose by the court. * * *

[1, 2] The point is entirely destitute of merit. In the first place, it is to be remarked that the criticism so directed against the complaint involves an objection, not to the sufficiency of that pleading to state a cause of action, but to the legal capacity of the plaintiffs to maintain the action or sue upon the obligation pleaded, and such an objection cannot be raised by a general demurrer. Sections 430 and 431, Code Civ. Proc. In the second place, assuming that the question could thus be raised and is so presented, the fact that their respective interests in the note had not been separated and vested in them severally could not have the effect legally of foreclosing their right to join in an action to enforce the collection thereof. Indeed, their respective several interests being undivided, it was their duty to join in a suit to recover on the note (section 378, Code Civ. Proc.), and, had they not done so, the action having been instituted by one of the beneficiaries only, the court could, upon a showing that it was necessary to a full and complete adjudication of the controversy according to the facts, require the other beneficiaries or legatees to be joined as parties plaintiff or even as defendants, if they refused to be joined as plaintiffs. Section 382, Code Civ. Proc.

[3] Thirdly, the appellant's proposition necessarily assumes that, under section 1675, it is compulsory upon the heirs, devisees, or legatees to whom has been assigned by a decree of distribution an estate in common and undivided, and in which their respective shares have not been separated and identified, to ask for the partition of the estate by commissioners appointed by the court for that purpose, and for the distribution to them in severalty of their respective interests as thus ascertained and determined. But the assumption is obviously erroneous. The proceeding contemplated by said section is one the institution of which rests wholly in the judgment or wishes or desires of the interested parties. They have the right, if they so prefer, to receive and hold their interests in common and undivided. Indeed, they have a perfect right to have the estate so distributed to them and then, after the making of the decree of distribution, themselves partition the estate and divide the property thereof among themselves. There is no conceivable reason why they should not pursue such a course, if they feel that they can themselves satisfactorily adjust and divide the estate among themselves.

[4] The law in question simply means that, where the decree of distribution awards to the heirs, devisees, and legatees, an estate in common and undivided, they are privileged to have their respective interests ascertained, separated, and distributed to them in severalty by a proceeding in partition, if they prefer to have their interests so distributed; but, in order to accomplish this judicially and to give the court jurisdiction to order a partition, some interested person must, before the decree of distribution is made, file a petition for that purpose and give legal notice thereof. Section 1676, Code Civ. Proc.; Buckley v. Superior Court, 102 Cal. 6, 36 Pac. 360, 41 Am. St. Rep. 135. If the petition and the notice required by said section are not filed and given, then, the decree having been made, the court loses further jurisdiction of the whole proceeding and cannot, in the exercise of its probate jurisdiction, order a partition. As before suggested, failure to file a petition for partition in such a case cannot, obviously, have the effect of destroying or in any wise impairing their legal and natural right to dispose of the property so acquired in any manner they may choose.

[5] The further claim is made that the complaint does not show that the plaintiffs "ever obtained any legal possession of the note," or that the note in suit was "delivered to the plaintiffs by the executor or the court"; or that "the said estate was closed, or that the executor was discharged." These objections, like the first above considered, are plainly and clearly without force.

The complaint, as has been shown, explicitly declares that, by the court's final decree of distribution of the estate of the deceased, the estate was distributed to the beneficiaries under the will of said deceased, and that among the effects thereof so distributed was the note in question; that, subsequent to said decree, the distributees divided the property of the estate among themselves and that by the division so made the said note became the property of the plaintiffs jointly "and they are now the owners and holders thereof." Thus it is very clearly made to appear that the estate was distributed, that the beneficiaries divided the same among themselves, which necessarily implies that they received the property so distributed and that the estate was closed, that the note became the joint property of the plaintiffs by the division effected by the beneficiaries themselves, and that they were the owners and holders of the same at the time of the institution of this action.

[6] As stated above, there is absolutely no merit whatever in this appeal, and it would be an unjust imputation against counsel for the appellant to hold that he did not realize the utter futility of the appeal when taking it. We may therefore properly assume that the appeal was designed to accomplish no other purpose than to delay the execution or satisfaction of the judgment.

Accordingly, the judgment is affirmed, with damages awarded against the appellant in the sum of $50.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by C. N. P. Ahlgren against Julia A. Walsh and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Garret W. McEnerney and Andrew F. Burke, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Denson, Cooley & Denson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant Julia A. Walsh appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying her motion for new trial.

The action was begun to recover an installment of a contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants whereby the plaintiff agreed to construct certain portions of a nine flat frame building for the defendants upon a lot in San Francisco. The contract was executed on October 25, 1905. The contract price was $23,763, to be paid "at times and in the manner following, to wit:

First, $1,000 when concrete foundations are built; second, $2,400, when the frame is up; third, $2,200 when building is inclosed and roof completed; fourth, $4,000 when brown coat of mortar is on; fifth, $2,500 when the plastering and outside mill work is finished." The remainder was payable in further installments until the completion. They are not important to our discussion. The installment sued for was the fifth, which by the part of the contract just quoted was to be paid "when the plastering and outside millwork was finished." To this clause, however, there was a proviso as follows:

"Provided that when each payment or installment shall become due, and at the final completion of the work, certificates in writing shall be obtained from said architect stating that the payment or installment is due or work completed, as the case may be, and the amount then due; and the said architect shall at said times deliver said certificates under his hand to the contractor, or, in lieu of such certificate, shall deliver to the contractor, in writing, under his hand, a just and true reason for not issuing the certificates, including a statement of the defects, if any, to be remedied, to entitle the contractor to the certificate or certificates. And, in the event of the failure of the architect to furnish and deliver said certificates, or any of them, or in lieu thereof the writing aforesaid, within three days after the times aforesaid, and after demand therefor made in writing by the contractor, the amount which may be claimed to be due by the contractor and stated in the said demand made by him for the certificates shall, at the expiration of said three days, become due and payable, and the owner shall be liable and bound to pay the same on demand. In case the architect delivers the writing aforesaid in lieu of the certificate, then a compliance by the contractor with the requirements of said writing shall entitle the contractor to the certificate."

The contractor proceeded with the performance of the work, and had earned and received four installments provided by the contract, amounting to $9,600, and had also finished the plastering and outside millwork. This work was completed and the fifth installment earned on the 17th of April, 1906, at noon. Early the next morning the earthquake of 1906 occurred, whereby the structure was greatly damaged. It was immediately followed by the great fire, which on the next day completely destroyed the building. The architect had not then made a certificate that the fifth installment had been earned by the finishing of the work therein specified and was due and payable. About 30 days afterwards the plaintiff demanded that the architect issue the certificate as required by the contract, and also demanded of the defendants payment of said sum of $2,500. The architect refused to give the certificate, and the defendants refused to pay the installment.

[1] The effect of the fifth clause of the contract, taken alone, and with respect to the conditions of payment, may best be shown by paraphrasing its provisions so as to connect those which relate to the fifth installment thus:

"The owner agrees, in consideration of the performance of this agreement by the contractor, to pay to said contractor $23,763.00, at times and in the manner following: Fifth, $2,500 when the plastering and outside millwork is finished: Provided that, when each installment shall become due, a certificate in writing shall be obtained from said architect, stating that the installment is due and the amount then due."

The second clause provided that the contractor was to do the work "under the direction and supervision and subject to the approval of said architect."

Upon such a contract there could be no doubt that the certificate of the architect must be given before the installment becomes presently payable and before any right of action therefor accrues. Coplew v. Durand, 153 Cal. 279, 95 Pac. 38, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 791, and cases cited. If there were no other provision in the contract, the plaintiff could not recover.

[2] The complaint does not allege that the parties after the fire mutually abandoned the contract, so far as reconstruction of the building is concerned. The evidence indicates that they did, but, in the absence of an allegation, such abandonment, if it occurred, cannot be made the foundation of a recovery by plaintiff.

[3] The general rules governing the rights of the parties to a building contract, where the building to be erected is partially constructed and is destroyed by fire before full completion, in cases where the contract is entire and contains no express provisions regarding their rights in that contingency, are not seriously controverted. If in such a case the parties do not rescind or abandon, but stand upon the contract, it controls their rights. The contractor and the owner each must perform his part of the contract. If the whole price is due upon completion, the contractor must complete it before he can lawfully demand payment. If it is payable in installments during the progress of the work, he cannot recover an installment earned, but not paid, at the time of the fire, until the reconstruction has proceeded to the stage necessary to make it due. He must stand the loss resulting from the fire and must replace at his own expense the structure that is destroyed. When he has done so, he may recover the full contract price. He is not excused from completing the performance of the contract by the fact that the fire has destroyed the structure already made. It is nevertheless possible for him to begin again and rebuild the entire building. Such destruction does not prevent performance within the meaning of section 1511 of the Civil Code. Wilmington T. Co. v. O'Neil, 98 Cal. 5, 32 Pac. 705; Barrere v. Somps, 113 Cal. 104, 45 Pac. 177, 572; Sample v. Fresno F. Co., 129 Cal. 228, 61 Pac. 1085; Wilson v. Alcatraz, etc., Co., 142 Cal. 182, 75 Pac. 787; Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 422, 95 Am. Dec.

115; 30 Am. & E. Enc. L. 1249; Civ. Code, § 1439. There are cases which hold that upon such a contract, if the contractor neglects to complete the performance after such destruction, the owner may recover from him the installments which had been paid prior to the destruction. Green v. Wells, 2 Cal. 584; Tompkins v. Dudley, 25 N. Y. 272, 82 Am. Dec. 349.

[4-6] From these principles it logically follows that, if there are progress payments on the work which are due or earned, but unpaid, at the time of the fire, the contractor cannot rightfully demand payment thereof, or recover the same, until he has rebuilt the structure to the point where, by the terms of the contract, the work required to make the particular payment due is again performed. As we have said, these principles apply where the contract contains no provisions declaring the rights of the parties in case of the destruction of the partly completed building. The contract sued on contained a provision on this subject. It is on this provision that the plaintiff relies to support his action. It is as follows:

"Twelfth: In case said work herein provided for should, before completion, be wholly destroyed by fire, defective soil, earthquake, or other act of God which the contractor could not have reasonably foreseen and provided for, then the loss occasioned thereby shall be sustained by the owner to the extent that he has paid installments thereon, or that may be due under the fifth clause of this contract; and the loss occasioned thereby and to be sustained by the contractor shall be for the uncompleted portion of said work upon which he may be engaged at the time of the loss, and for which no payment is yet due under said fifth clause of this contract."

"In the event of a partial destruction of said work by any of the causes above named, then the loss to be sustained by the owner shall be in the proportion that the amounts of installments paid or due bears to the total amount of work done and materials furnished, estimated according to said contract price, and the balance of said loss to be sustained by the contractor."

The appellant claims that the case is one of partial destruction only, and is governed by the second part of the twelfth clause which, he contends, requires the contractor to repair the earthquake damage as a condition precedent to the accrual to him of a right to demand and receive the fifth installment. We do not determine whether such repair was a condition precedent or not under that part of the clause; for we think it was a case of total destruction provided for by the first part of the twelfth clause. It was proven that the earthquake shook off the plastering and left the walls out of plumb. If no fire had followed, doubtless it would have been a case of partial destruction. But the earthquake started fires, the flames spread and continued for several days, and on the day following the earthquake they reached the building in question and entirely destroyed it. It then became a case of total destruction. We are unable to see any force in the theory that the interval of a day between the primary cause of the destruction and the ultimate result of complete destruction operated to limit the contractor's rights to those provided in case of partial destruction, or to prevent it from becoming a case of total destruction when such total destruction took place. The right to recover this money depends on the provisions regarding total destruction.

Assuming for the present that the fifth installment was due within the meaning of the provision regarding total destruction, the question arises whether, in view of the principles we have stated, the contractor is entitled to payment thereof before he has so far reconstructed the building that the "plastering and outside millwork" is again finished. The appellant earnestly insists that this question should be answered in the negative, but we think the contract requires an affirmative answer. The fifth clause provides for the payments to be made in the regular performance of the contract, and it makes the performance of a specified part of the work a condition precedent to the payment of each installment of the price. The twelfth clause does not relate to the regular performance of the contract, but to the division of the damages caused by a total destruction of partially completed work. It is an independent provision, and the apportionment of the loss from total destruction as there specified is not declared to be dependent on further prosecution of the work, or on the reconstruction of the whole or any part of the building. It provides that in case of a total destruction the owner shall sustain a certain loss. This means that he shall sustain it at that time and upon the happening of that event, and not that he shall sustain it at some future time or upon the happening of some additional event. A part of this loss which the owner must thereupon sustain, it declares, is the loss of any installment of the price which was due and unpaid at the time of the destruction. Now so long as he delays payment thereof he suffers no such loss. In order to make the clause of any effect as to that part of the loss he must make the payment to the contractor. Then and then only does he sustain the loss. And, as the loss is to be sustained by him upon the happening of a total destruction, and not afterward, or upon any other event, it necessarily follows that upon such destruction he immediately becomes liable to the contractor for such unpaid installment, regardless of the further performance of the contract by the contractor, the reconstruction of the building, or of the question whether or not there follows a mutual abandonment of the contract.

We are of the opinion that the fifth installment was "due" at the time of the fire, within the meaning of the clause apportioning the loss on total destruction, notwithstanding the failure of the architect to issue a certificate to that effect. The clause purports to apportion the entire loss. That which the owner is not to bear is to be sustained by the contractor. The latter's loss is to be only "for the uncompleted portion of said work upon which he may be engaged at the time of the loss, and for which no payment is yet due under said fifth clause of this contract." This "uncompleted portion" of the work obviously does not include the "plastering and outside millwork" to be done in order to earn the fifth installment; for all of that work was completed before the fire occurred, and he was not then "engaged" upon it. It must therefore refer only to work done in the further prosecution of the contract, after the finishing of the plastering and outside millwork, and which had not then progressed far enough to earn the succeeding installment. The final words, "and for which no payment is yet due under said fifth clause of this contract," from their position in the sentence and their grammatical relation, can refer only to the "uncompleted portion of said work" designated by the first part of the clause fixing the contractor's loss, and hence they do not include the completed work by which the fifth installment was earned. The corresponding meaning and application should be given to the similar phrase in the part fixing the owner's loss; for the entire clause should be harmonized, if reasonably practicable. Unless, therefore, the provision of the fifth clause requiring the issuance of the architect's certificate in order to render an earned installment due and payable overrides the meaning and grammatical construction of this part of the twelfth clause, the fifth installment must be held to have become due at the time of the fire, and to be included in the loss to be sustained by the contractor.

Certain statutory rules of interpretation here apply, and by resort to them the two clauses may be reconciled. A contract must receive such an interpretation as will make it reasonable and capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties (Civ. Code, § 1643), and so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other (Civ. Code, § 1641).

It would be impossible for the architect to examine the work after a total destruction to determine whether or not the work necessary to make a particular installment due had been completed. If such certificate were necessary to the apportionment of the loss, the contractor's rights in the matter would not depend on the work he had done and the money he had justly earned before the destruction, but upon his diligence in demanding a certificate and the architect's industry in inspecting the premises and his promptness in making out and issuing the certificate. In the present case the fifth installment was earned at so short a time before the fire that even great diligence would scarcely have brought forth a certificate. Such contingencies are not unusual. To put that loss on the contractor in such a case would be unjust; for the destruction did not relieve the contractor from the performance of the contract. It stipulates that delay caused by acts of God shall be added to the time allowed to the contractor for performance. Hence the delay caused by the earthquake did not excuse performance. Fire does not come within the definition of the term "act of God," unless it is caused by lightning or some other superhuman agency. Fay v. Pacific Imp. Co., 93 Cal. 262, 26 Pac. 1099, 28 Pac. 943, 16 L. R. A. 188, 27 Am. St. Rep. 198; Pope v. Farmers' Milling Co., 130 Cal. 141, 62 Pac. 384, 53 L. R. A. 673, 80 Am. St. Rep. 87; Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 423, 95 Am. Dec. 115; Chidester v. Consolidated D. Co., 59 Cal. 202; 1 Corpus Juris, 1177. But the fire did not render performance actually impossible, in point of law, although the pleadings admit that it did in point of fact, and, as we have seen, the destruction by that cause did not excuse performance. The owner therefore had the right to demand the reconstruction of the work destroyed and the completion of the building as contracted for. If he had made such a demand, and the contractor had proceeded accordingly, the result would be that the contractor would lose the money he had justly earned by his first performance. In case of a fire he might be deprived thereof by the failure of the architect to promptly issue a certificate, or by the impossibility of obtaining it in time, and altogether without fault on his part. A contract containing express provisions to that effect and making such results probable would be condemned at once as absurd and unreasonable. It is not to be supposed that the parties would have agreed to such terms if they had been clearly expressed. There is no express declaration in the fifth clause that the issuance of a certificate is a condition precedent to payment of an installment. The language to that effect, though so interpreted by many decisions, is neither express nor clear. It is difficult to believe that the parties intended or understood that this proviso should apply to the twelfth clause.

The contract as a whole does not require that interpretation. The word "due," upon which this claim of the owner is founded, as applied to a debt or obligation to pay money, does not always mean that the money is then immediately payable. It may be so used, but it often merely denotes the idea of a complete debt, an existing obligation, or money fully earned, but not payable until a future time or until the happening of another event. Webster's Dict. It is used in the first sense in the fifth clause of this contract. It first declares that "when" the plastering and mill-work "is finished" the owner shall pay the contractor $2,500. Then comes the proviso "that, when each payment or installment shall become due," a certificate shall be obtained that the "installment is due" and stating the amount "then due." The first phrase of the proviso uses the word "due" to describe money earned, but not necessarily immediately payable. The installment must "become due" before any certificate is to be obtained. The event of its becoming due must precede the issuance of a certificate that it is due. The statement that it is due is of a thing that has already happened. The procuring of a certificate is by the proviso made a condition of its becoming payable, but not of its becoming due. That this distinction between being merely due, that is, fully earned, or owing, and being "due and payable," was understood and intended, is shown by the succeeding declaration that when, on demand, the architect fails to issue the certificate within three days, the installment shall then "become due and payable." This implies that such installment was due before it became payable. It is also shown by the statements in the sixth clause that the owner shall be liable for damages caused by his delay in paying any installment after it "shall become due and payable," and that such delay might be held to prevent performance, if continued for more than five days after an installment had "become due and payable." They were careful to provide that an installment should not only be "due," but also "payable," before the owner could be in default. From all these considerations, and inasmuch as the twelfth clause relates to actual work done and actual loss suffered from its destruction, and not to formal proofs of completion, we think the reasonable interpretation is that in the twelfth clause the word "due" designates an installment earned and unpaid, whether a certificate had been issued therefor or not. With this interpretation the clause is given an effect that is just, reasonable, and definite.

This question was decided by the District Court of Appeal in Hettinger v. Thiele, 15 Cal. App. 1, 113 Pac. 121. In that case the facts were the same as in the case at bar, except that the fifth clause, instead of declaring that certain sums were to be paid when certain parts of the work were finished, provided that 75 per cent. of the price should be paid as the work progressed. It contained the same proviso requiring the certificate from the architect before money for work done was payable. In that respect its language was identical with the contract here sued on, as also was the twelfth clause. It was held that the loss payable by the owner upon a total destruction included the amount due for the work done at that time, and that the issuance of a certificate by the architect was unnecessary to the accrual of a cause of action therefor. A petition for rehearing thereof was denied by the Supreme Court.

Our conclusion is that, under the twelfth clause of the contract, if there is a total destruction, the owner must sustain the loss of all installments of the contract price that were due at that time and which had then been paid by him, and also of any installment which had been earned and was then due, in the sense that it was owing, and which is not then paid, that, in order to carry out the intent of the contract that he shall sustain the loss of such unpaid installment then earned, it is necessary that he shall pay the same to the contractor, and that neither the issuance of an architect's certificate therefor nor the reconstruction of the building by the contractor to a stage where the installment would again be earned are conditions precedent to the accrual of a cause of action in favor of the contractor against the owner for such installment.

The appellant cites the case of Anderson v. Quick, 163 Cal. 658, 126 Pac. 871, and insists that it, in effect, holds that the contractor, in case of total destruction, cannot, under the twelfth clause, recover any installment then due and unpaid unless he has reconstructed the building to a point where such installment will again be earned. The passage relied on as supporting this contention is as follows:

"The owner is to sustain a part of the loss, and this he does when, upon restoration of the building to a point where an installment becomes due, he is required to make duplicate payment of an installment already paid, or due and unpaid before the loss."

In that case there was no installment due or unpaid. The action was for damages alleged to have been caused by the act of the owner in preventing the contractor from reconstructing the building after a partial destruction. The passage quoted is merely a part of the discussion of the question whether the conduct of the owner in refusing to meet the contractor to settle and adjust the loss arising from the partial destruction was a legal prevention of the reconstruction of the building by the contractor. His position was that the contract required that such adjustment should precede the reconstruction. It was in answer to this position and in demonstrating that the contract did not so provide that the language above quoted was used. The passage, in effect, merely states that the owner does not actually sustain the loss until he has paid an installment the second time. The question whether or not such payment of an installment unpaid at the time of the destruction could be enforced before reconstruction, was not involved in the case, and there was no intention to decide anything on that point.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 996 — REVIEW — FINDING—"INFERENCE."

An "inference" being but a reasonable deduction and conclusion from facts proven, it being the peculiar and exclusive province of the trial court or trial jury in the first instance to make such a finding of fact, which it is the especial right of every litigant to have determined, the Supreme Court sits only to review inferences, as other findings of fact, with the power to set them aside as a matter of law only when not sustained by adequate evidence.

If there be two inferences equally reasonable and equally susceptible of being drawn from the proved facts, the one favoring fair dealing and the other favoring corrupt practice, it is the express duty of trial court or jury to draw the inference favorable to fair dealing.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Isaac Ryder against J. E. Bamberger and others. From a judgment for defendants and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Flint, Gray & Barker, Henry S. Van Dyke, and L. W. Jutten, all of Los Angeles, and Frank P. Deering and Joseph D. Redding, both of San Francisco, for appellant. W. E. Mitchell, Hunsaker & Britt, and Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, all of Los Angeles, and Henry Ach, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff's action is for damages for fraud. The gravamen of his complaint is that he was a stockholder in the Salt Lake Oil Company and was induced by the misrepresentations and concealments of the defendants to sell his stock for $2 a share, when in truth and in fact it was worth very much more. He lays his damages in the sum of $21,671. Certain of the defendants, and principally the defendants Bamberger, Wood, Price, and Phillips, are specifically charged with the active perpetration and consummation of the frauds, while certain other of the defendants, Chanslor and Porter, while not active in the perpetration of the frauds, are in effect charged as joint conspirators and reapers of the profit.

In outline plaintiff's cause of action may be thus stated: He was a stockholder of the Salt Lake Oil Company of California, owning 1667 shares of its capital stock. The total capital stock, all issued, was 500,000 shares, of the par value of $1 per share. Of the defendants, Wood was president, Price manager, J. E. Bamberger a heavy stockholder and a director of the company, and Phillips a director and secretary. Wood, Bamberger, and Price controlled the company and had pooled the majority of the stock, which they owned. Defendant Porter was the general manager of the Associated Oil Company, a very large and prosperous company capitalized for $40,000,000. Defendant Chanslor was one of the directors of the Associated Oil Company. These men conspired to incorporate and did incorporate the Amalgamated Oil Company, which was to be a mere holding company, designed to acquire controlling interests in sundry oil companies and market their products. One-half or more of the stock of the Amalgamated Oil Company was to be sold to the Associated Oil Company, which it was understood should direct the affairs and control the destiny of the Amalgamated Oil Company. The Salt Lake Oil Company was producing oil, and its wells were located near Los Angeles. The Associated Oil Company had large contracts for the supply of oil in and in the neighborhood of Los Angeles, which contracts it could much more profitably fill by using the oil of the Salt Lake Oil Company rather than by using its own oil, as its wells were much farther away from this southern territory, and the delivery necessitated a long haul by railroad. It was in contemplation that the Associated Oil Company, thus owning a control of the Amalgamated Oil Company, would turn over to the latter company most of its contracts for the delivery of oil in the Southern part of the state, thus insuring to the Salt Lake Oil Company a ready and profitable market for its product. This conspiracy had been effectuated to the extent of an agreement between the conspirators for the organization of the Amalgamated Oil Company, and for the assignment to that company of the valuable oil contracts of the Associated Oil Company, when, for the purpose of securing to their own personal ends and gain the minority stock of the Salt Lake Oil Company, on October 25, 1904, Wood, Bamberger, and Price, in collusion with Porter and Chanslor, sent to all the minority stockholders and stockholders outside of the pool a letter and report. The letter spoke of the difficulty of financing the company and in avoiding assessments on its stock, due to the depressed condition of the oil market and the strenuous competition at unremunerative prices for the sale of oil; that these conditions threatened "to leave values very uncertain for an indefinite period," and that therefore "the principal owners of the capital stock have accepted an offer of two dollars per share. In doing so we deem that the best values that can be secured for our stock for some period in the future has been accomplished. We have obtained for every stockholder until the 1st day of December, 1904, the opportunity of having his stock taken over at two dollars per share cash. Any other policy would have to result in assessments and a radical competition in the disposing of the oil." The letter further set forth that the stockholders would receive this $2 per share for their stock upon sending it, properly indorsed, to the Security Savings Bank of Los Angeles. Accompanying each of these letters was a copy of the report of defendant Price, the manager. This report demands exposition. Before making it, however, and in explanation of the report itself, it is pertinent to point out that the Salt Lake Oil Company was the lessee of 1,000 acres of land, holding this land under the terms of a most stringent lease. The lease called for continuous drilling until at least one producing well was obtained upon every three acres of oil producing land. It provided for the relinquishment by the lessees at the expiration of five years after the successful completion or the abandonment of the first well of all of the leased premises except such portion as should have been demonstrated to be oil producing in paying quantities by actual operation at the time. It allowed a suspension of developing but not of drilling for a period not exceeding three months whenever oil could not be sold at the wells in excess of 50 cents a barrel. The royalty of the lessor was a gross one-sixth of the oil product, with free transportation of this one-sixth through any conduit laid by the lessee. There were other terms unnecessary to set forth of equally stringent character, and of the lease it may be said finally, that years after the date of the transactions here complained of and after enormous expenditures of money in the effort to secure oil, but 290 acres of the 1,000 acres had proved to be oil land, while at the time of these transactions but 160 acres had so been proved.

Returning now to the report above referred to. That report declared that a group of 20 wells had been sunk, all of which were producers, excepting Nos. 1 and 2. Four or five more wells were under way. The financial statement was unsatisfactory. The liabilities were $52,000, over all available assets. Notes payable amounted to $55,000, a part of which had been advanced by the directors personally, and a large part of which was due to the bank on demand notes. Heavy expenditures were necessary to comply with the terms of the lease, and the additional requirements anticipated for 1905 over and above all possible receipts were estimated at $40,000. The condition of the oil market in Southern California, and particularly that condition as it affected the Salt Lake Oil Company, was represented as uncertain and perilous, with no prospect of improvement in the immediate future. We may now, with advantage, quote from the report itself, for the reason that it contains the asserted misrepresentations upon which appellant relies, representations, however, every word of which the trial court found to be fair and true. The setting forth of this report will relieve from the necessity of elaborating in this statement of facts, upon the existing condition of affairs:

"The pipe line is now under construction and our contract calls for 80 per cent. payment on these expenditures every 10 days. Our monthly expenses must be met promptly. The amount on special account is long past due and should be taken care of. Our loan at the bank is due on call. Although that may be continued for a period of time, as long as business looks prosperous for the company, but in view of the unsettled conditions of the oil market, the tendency of prices downward, there is no certainty as to how long the bank may look favorably upon the loan. It requires $20,000.00 or $25,000.00 working capital to swing our business from pay-day to pay-day at the present time. The plans we have under way, necessary to be completed within the next 90 days, will create a total liability, including working capital, of about $120,000.00. The company as a corporation has no bank credit. The personal indorsements that have secured credit for the company in the past cannot be depended upon for securing any additional loans, in view of the fact that the bank requires a one-day's sight note, and the certainty of a much lower price for oil, and the uncertainty of securing a market in quantity and price for the production of the company to meet the requirements. Strenuous competition makes it extremely hazardous for a competing company to be involved in debt to any one.

"The situation of the oil market at the present time is very unsettled. The market at the present time is practically sold up in periods of 1, 2, and 3 years. Any additional trade we might secure, unless it be a sale of oil to those who have secured business, will be very limited in quantity, and will have to be taken over on very radical competition and no doubt at radically lower figures.

"So far, on investigation, I find that it will seemingly be impossible for us to ever secure any of the business of the large transportation companies, and we might as well conclude that that will continue to be the condition. In our last efforts to secure a portion of that business, our bid on the opening of the bids, we think was the lowest, still, the business was given to a competitor, who afterwards, I judge, was favored with a further opportunity.

"The radical change in the market situation in the last 60 and 90 days calls for your earnest consideration as to future operations, and ways and means found for disposing of our oil. Our financial situation requires immediate attention.

"Our lessor, under our lease, requires us to keep up a constant production and also drilling. It is hardly possible that we can get any relief in that direction from the lessor. There is plenty of oil within our territory, but it's only subject to our ownership for a limited period of time. After the expiration of the lease, what is left, belongs to the owner of the land. Hence, it behooves us within our time to dispose of as much of it as possible. There being, seemingly, an unlimited quantity, at least for the period of our lease, it becomes good policy that we dwell not on the question of price per barrel, but more to the point as to how many dollars we can create during the period of our lease, by doing a larger volume of business. Hence, so long as there are consumers to supply, it behooves us to supply them at as near the price offered by others as it may be possible for us to obtain. Therefore, whatever will lead to a sale of the greatest quantity of oil, at a price that will yield a profit, is all that the future has in store for us.

"Six months ago the market conditions were such that we anticipated that a loan of $100,000.00, for one year, would accomplish all these results and secure to us a proper pipe line and pumping plant, but under the present conditions of the market, if we continue the expenditures planned, in addition to those we are compelled to conduct, under the terms of our lease, it will require a much larger period of time to get rid of the floating debt.

"You will note that the possible receipts under the contracts to-day will approximate gross at the wells $108,000.00 for 1905. A fair starter has been made on business for 1906, but that will not be any relief to our present requirements. To do the work under our lease and protect our rights, to prove territory, to produce and to make the necessary betterments, exclusive of pipe line investment, will consume our probable receipts for the year. The probability of increasing receipts other than nominal amounts, on spot orders, looks very questionable. Our requirements on pipe line and tankage, in addition to what has been expended, will amount to about $40,000.00.

"At the present time we have a market for less than half of the present production.

"If we can finance our present requirements we must look to volume of business for our profits in the future rather than to price per barrel. The title in fee in this territory, does not belong to us, and we have no interest in the remainder after the term of our lease expires."

To complete this sketch outline of the salient facts, it may here be added that at the time this letter and report were sent out the Amalgamated Company had been organized, the defendants Bamberger, Wood, and Price, turning in all of their stock in the Salt Lake Oil Company and their ownership of two adjoining companies, the Arcturus Oil Company and the Utah-California Consolidated Oil Company, corporations owned by these defendants and controlling lands near by or adjacent to the Salt Lake Oil Company. In these latter companies, plaintiff was not interested. Plaintiff sold his stock for $2 a share, a price which, by all of the testimony, was more than its value. Thereafter the stock of the Amalgamated Oil Company became of great value. If it had not increased in value, undoubtedly this litigation would not have been prosecuted. Because of that increase in value and of the nature of these transactions, plaintiff's position is that there was such a fiduciary relationship between the directors (who also owned a majority of the stock) as to make it their duty to disclose to the minority stockholders the terms and conditions upon which they were parting with their stock, and also to give these minority stockholders the option to take shares in the Amalgamated Oil Company upon the same terms as those which were accepted by the defendants. The concealment of the "Amalgamated deal," coupled with the duty resting upon the defendants to disclose to the fullest degree the nature of this deal, is thus made the head and front of their offending. Other charges going to deliberate misrepresentations were made against the defendants, but they were unsupported and were abandoned at the trial and are not here pressed upon the consideration of the court.

The case is rather exceptional in one respect. All of the evidence upon the controverted matters is either record evidence contained in letters and reports, or is evidence from the lips of the defendants themselves, and in all of their evidence they earnestly insist that every word which they put forth and every representation which they made were true. Not only do they deny any design or attempt to put a fraud upon the minority stockholders, but they insist that by the sacrifice of their own interests they protected the interests of the minority stockholders and enabled them to sell their stock upon terms which they, the defendants, would have been glad to receive for their own stock, and which they were unable to receive.

So much in outline, it remaining only to be said that the findings of the court were wholly against the plaintiff upon all the controverted matters and equally comprehensive upon the question of the good faith and fair dealing of the defendants. Following the judgment, plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and his appeal is addressed to the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain certain material findings of the court.

At the outset of this consideration and for the clarifying of the discussion, it should be said that there is no conflict in the evidence upon any vital matter, and that the evidence is wholly in favor of defendants. It has been said, also, that the trial court found in accordance with this evidence. Appellant concedes this and declares in his brief that:

"It is not a question, however, of conflicting evidence in the ordinary sense. The only dispute here is as to the inference to be drawn from the probative facts. * * * It thus results that the only questions to be considered by this court are as to ultimate facts, that is, whether actionable fraud can be inferred from the admitted facts, and to what extent plaintiff was thereby damaged by defendants."

And finally appellant says, and in this is found an erroneous position upon which he greatly relies throughout his brief:

"This court has always held that an appellate court has the right of drawing its own inferences from admitted probative facts in such cases, unimpeded by the conclusions of the trial court, where all the evidence is brought up on an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. That is, it is as if such questions of construction were questions of law, and this court may pass upon them with as unimpeded a judgment as if they were being passed upon in the first instance."

[1-3] Herein lies a great error, which affects the whole of appellant's argument. This court has not, never has declared that it has, and has never exercised under its power of review, such a power of original determination of facts. For this court to do so would be for this court to make findings of fact. No case which appellant cites in the slightest supports his position upon this matter. They are without detailed review of them, simply cases announcing the familiar principle that when a general finding of fact is drawn by the trial court as a conclusion of fact, from special findings of fact, also drawn by the trial court, if these special findings of fact are inconsistent with the general findings, the special findings will control. An "inference" is but a reasonable deduction and conclusion of facts proven, which court or jury is entitled to draw. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1958, 1960; Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 176, 116 Pac. 530. If the finding of fact is based upon a reasonable inference, it is not within the power of this court to set it aside any more than it is within its power to set aside any other finding supported by sufficient legal evidence; for a finding of fact based upon reasonable inference drawn from facts proved with legal sufficiency is, as much and as completely as is any other finding of fact, a finding based upon good and sufficient evidence. It is the peculiar and exclusive province of trial court or trial jury in the first instance to make such finding of fact, and it is the especial right of every litigant to have those facts so determined by court or jury, this court sitting only to review the findings and being empowered to set them aside as matter of law only when not sustained by adequate evidence. So, when appellant states that the only question to be considered is "whether actionable fraud can be inferred from the admitted facts," it is a surrender of his case. For, if there be two inferences equally reasonable and equally susceptible of being drawn from the proved facts, the one favoring fair dealing and the other favoring corrupt practice, it is the express duty of court or jury to draw the inference favorable to fair dealing. Levy v. Scott, 115 Cal. 41, 46 Pac. 892; Thomas v. Visalia Electric Co., 169 Cal. 658, 147 Pac. 972; Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 664, 59 Pac. 264; note to Burch v. Smith (Tex.) 65 Am. Dec. 154. For fraud must always be proved, so that when the plaintiff's case goes no further than to es-establish a state of facts from which the inference of fraud may or may not be reasonably drawn, he has failed to establish his charge by a preponderance of the evidence, and it becomes the duty of court or jury, as has been said, to find in favor of innocence and uprightness. This does not, of course, mean that the fraud must be proved by direct evidence. This is not always, nor even often, possible; but it does mean that the indirect evidence and the inference to be drawn from the proved facts must be so convincing as to satisfy trial court or trial jury that fraud was designed and accomplished. If therefore we should accept appellant's statement as above quoted, that the sole proposition is whether fraud can be inferred from the admitted facts, the complete answer is that, conceding that fraud might be inferred, the trial court upon substantial evidence has declined to infer it and its action in so doing is not here open to question.

What appellant means, however, doubtless, is that the question is not whether actionable fraud can be inferred, but whether it must be inferred from the admitted facts, and to the consideration of the evidence from this point of view we thus come.

That evidence shows that Price, Wood, and J. E. Bamberger had become greatly discouraged over the future prospects of the Salt Lake Oil Company which they managed and controlled. They considered themselves in a precarious position from which they were anxious to be relieved, profitably, if possible. In particular, their discouragement lay in the facts that they were obliged at an expense estimated at $20,000 a month to continue their development work under their lease, and that when a well developed oil they could not sell it. Contracts covering the oil consumption of the southern part of the state were already let for periods of one, two, and three years. To store their oil involved additional expense. The Associated Oil Company was a great and wealthy producer and competitor. They endeavored to interest the Associated Oil Company through its manager, Porter. They wished Porter to buy the Salt Lake Oil Company lease and properties for a million and a half dollars. They desired also to have Porter buy the Arcturus Company, which they owned and which was capitalized for $500,000 in shares of the par value of $1 each. The Arcturus Oil Company had brought in a well which proved up as oil land about 160 acres of the Salt Lake Oil Company's leasehold and about 80 acres of its own leasehold. They also owned the Utah-California Consolidated Oil Company, which held neighboring lands under leases but had not as yet produced any oil. All these properties they desired to sell. Porter, representing the Associated Oil Company, was willing to negotiate with them, but not at all along the lines which the defendants desired. Porter was not willing to buy at all either stock or properties. He would not even buy the majority holdings of these defendants. He was willing to effect an arrangement whereby they should sell to him one half of their holdings, these defendants retaining the other half, pooling their issues, and thus controlling these three oil companies. They desired Porter to buy the Salt Lake Oil Company at $1,500,000, or $3 per share, and he laughed at them. They asked $1.50 a share for their 500,000 shares of Arcturus stock, and again he laughed at them. To reach a basis of understanding, it was agreed that they would consider the Salt Lake stock as worth $2 a share, although Porter always insisted that it was more than it was worth. Porter's idea was to control the three companies. He considered the Arcturus to be worth $1 a share, but would not deal with them upon that basis if the Salt Lake stock was to be considered as worth $2 a share. However, he would treat the field as a whole and did not care whether they put 50 cents on one and $1 on the other so that the total price for the whole field would not exceed the sum at which he valued it. Finally, under the insistence of the defendants, against the protest of Porter and other directors of the Associated Salt Lake was worth no such price, a basis was agreed upon of $2 for Salt Lake stock and 50 cents for Arcturus stock and $8,000 for the stock of the Utah-California Consolidated Oil Company; but this price was to be only the basis of negotiations and was to be considered with reference, solely, to the defendants' holdings. Porter did not want any of the minority stock and would not agree to buy any part of it at any price. The defendants insisted that they could not go on with the negotiations unless the minority stockholders were given the option to sell at the same price of $2 a share. Porter said they carried too much sentiment into business and refused to consent. The defendants then endeavored to dispose of the Salt Lake Oil Company's property for $1,500,000 to the Southern Pacific Railroad, but nothing came of it. On October 13th, Porter formulated his proposition on behalf of the Associated Oil Company, which he represented, which was the organization of a holding company to be known as the Amalgamated Oil Company. This proposition contemplated the purchase by the Associated Oil Company of one-half of the controlling stock in these three corporations owned by the defendants. A new corporation was to be organized, capitalized at $5,000,000, divided into 50,000 shares. To this new corporation the Associated Oil Company, and the defendants were to convey their stock in the three oil companies receiving in return in equal proportions stock in the Amalgamated Oil Company. This stock, in turn, was to be pooled, with the control in the Associated Oil Company. In this not the slightest provision was made for the taking over of the stock of the minority stockholders, and the defendants absolutely refused to negotiate upon the terms of this written offer, insisting that the minority stockholders should be given the right to sell their stock if they so desired to the new company which it was proposed to be formed, at the rate of $2 a share. Porter replied that $2 a share was more than any one would value the stock at, and that the only reason that he consented to that valuation so far as the defendants were concerned was on account of the peculiar situation and the fact that the transaction when completed would take in the other companies. The meeting dissolved by Price telling Porter to go ahead and form his holding company, they would proceed step by step, and, if they found that finally they could not agree, Price and his associates would take the holding company off Porter's hands. In this last declaration appellant finds evidence of fraudulent design in the expression of the willingness of these defendants to take his holding company out of the hands of the incorporators in case they could not come to a satisfactory business arrangement, but manifestly the holding company without any property whatsoever would have no value greater than the cost of preparing and filing the articles of incorporation, and the plain import of defendant's language was simply this, that as they controlled these three oil companies and as a holding company might be a convenient means of consolidating and prosecuting the business of the three, if an agreement between them and the Associated Oil Company could not be reached, they would take over to themselves this propertyless corporation to be known as the Amalgamated and use it for the convenient transaction of their own business if it should seem desirable so to do.

The negotiations proceeded, the Amalgamated Company was formed with Price, Bamberger, Wood, Chanslor, and Porter as the incorporators. It held its organization meeting in Los Angeles on October 27, 1904, Porter and Canfield (a director of Associated) both declaring that the stock of the Salt Lake Oil Company was not worth $2 a share, finally agreed to the arrangement whereby the stockholders were given an opportunity to sell it to the newly organized Amalgamated Oil Company for $2 a share. In other respects the agreement above outlined was, generally speaking, carried out, saving that the defendants received, and, indeed, were obliged to take, 71 cents cash for their Salt Lake oil stock. The remainder of the purchase price upon the basis of $2 a share they took in stock of the Amalgamated Oil Company. The uncontradicted testimony is that, so far as they themselves were concerned, they entered into this arrangement with reluctance and would have been glad to sell all of their pooled stock for $1.50 per share cash, but that the only terms which they could arrange were terms binding them against their wishes to retain this stock interest in the new corporation. Touching the value of the Salt Lake stock outside of this evidence, it is shown that defendant Price had purchased 50,000 shares at 40 cents a share and had taken an option on 25,000 additional shares at 75 cents a share. Defendant Phillips owned 52,500 shares, 2,500 shares of which he had purchased in November, 1903, at 60 cents a share. In February, 1904, he sold 50,000 shares for 80 cents a share and sold his remaining 2,500 shares at $2 per share cash. It therefore appears that this conspirator with full knowledge of all the transactions sold at the exact price which plaintiff received for his stock. In addition to this, such of the minority stockholders as were friends and relatives of the defendants, Bamberger's son and brother and Wood's stepson sold in like manner, and, as has been said, the testimony is that the defendants themselves would have been glad to have sold out all of their holdings for a less price than that which they had secured for the minority stockholders.

[4] Thus is presented such evidentiary matters as are necessary to this consideration. As has been said, all findings of the court were in favor of the integrity and fair dealing of the defendants, and those findings in every respect which we have considered are abundantly sustained. There is left to appellant but one proposition, which itself has heretofore been outlined. Appellant's contention is that there was such a relation of trust and confidence existing between the defendants and himself as to impose upon them the imperative duty to disclose as their letter and report did not disclose the full and complete nature of their proposed transactions with the Amalgamated, to the end that with this information before him plaintiff might determine whether or not he would sell his stock, and it is said that this duty of disclosure resting with defendants, their failure to disclose amounts to fraudulent concealment.

[5, 6] That the last proposition is sound in equity is, of course, true. Where there is a duty to disclose the failure to disclose is concealment. But the findings of the court are that the letter and report fairly and fully stated the conditions at the time it was circulated; that the defendants did not conceal their arrangement with the Associated Oil; that no especial relationship of confidence or trust existed between defendants and plaintiff; that plaintiff did not specifically rely upon any such relationship; that no such relationship of trust existed other than that growing out of the position of these defendants as directors and officers of the Salt Lake Company; and that as such directors and officers they did not fail in any duty cast upon them by law or equity.

So far as concerns the charge of concealment, this fact is unquestioned. There never was anything to prevent Bamberger and his associates from selling to Porter all or one-half of their pooled stock at any time, and thus leave the minority stockholders to be handled by the buyers in any way they saw fit. There is equally no doubt but that a perfectly legitimate step, considering the bad financial condition of the Salt Lake Company, would have been an assessment upon its stock. It needs no gift of prophesy to foresee what would have been the result of such an assessment. It could easily have been borne by the Amalgamated Oil Company with the backing of the Associated Oil Company and by these defendants whose financial responsibility was unquestioned and who already had advanced large sums to the Salt Lake Company. It is perfectly clear that, if there had been any design to take an unfair advantage of the minority stockholders and to acquire their stock for little or nothing, the method adopted would have been the "freeze out" by assessment. The history of the Salt Lake Company after its control went into the Amalgamated shows that it was a heavy borrower to the extent of $150,000 from the Associated Oil Company. Can it be doubted but that, if this minority stock was outstanding, assessments, perfectly legitimate in law, would have been levied? The utmost that could be foretold from the Amalgamated deal was that, probably through the Amalgamated's connection with the Associated Oil, the Amalgamated would have contracts for supplying oil, and that the Salt Lake Oil Company would find an added market for its product through the Amalgamated; but this did not mean that the Salt Lake Oil Company in the depressed condition of the market would make a profit upon the oil. All the time under its contract of lease it was obliged to continue drilling for oil, so that there was reason to believe that even marketing the increased product (better as that would be than having that product on hand) the market price would entail loss. It is to be remembered that Bamberger and his associates had not the power to extend to the minority stockholders the option to take Amalgamated stock in lieu of their own. The Associated Oil people never contemplated this, and the testimony shows that they did contemplate that, once having control of the Salt Lake Company, they would squeeze out, by legitimate methods, the minority stockholders. Certainly they were not interested in the welfare of the minority holders.

How, then, may the situation be summed up? Bamberger and his associates proposed to sell their controlling stock as they had the right to do without conference with or the knowledge of the minority stockholders. The report which they presented to the stockholders was full, fair, and correct. It made no mention of the terms of their sale other than that it was on the basis of $2 per share, as in fact it was. It was not incumbent upon them to declare the terms of their sale, and the minority stockholders could not have availed themselves of like terms even had they desired so to do. No trust obligation resting upon the defendants imposed upon them the duty either of securing the same terms to their minority stockholders or of disclosing to the minority stockholders what those terms were. Had Bamberger and his associates been guilty of the evil machinations with which they are charged, a simple and direct method of accomplishing them quite within the law was before them. They needed but to assess the stock. And, finally, upon this matter it deserves mention that the great value which subsequently accrued to the Amalgamated stock (not to the Salt Lake stock) came largely from the fact that an oil gusher of enormous productivity was developed upon the land of the Arcturus Company in which this appellant had no interest. From what has been said it is manifest that: First, as stockholders, the defendants had a perfect right to dispose of their stock (which was all that they did) without the slightest regard to the wishes and desires or knowledge of the minority stockholders; and, second, that as directors they concealed nothing which plaintiff was entitled to know or which would have been of value to him if he had known. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider or analyze at length such cases as Strong v. Repide, 213 U. S. 419, 29 Sup. Ct. 521, 53 L. Ed. 853, where appellant absolutely controlling a corporation owning Friar lands in the Philippines and carrying on the negotiations with the United States government for the purchase of those lands, he alone having the power to effectuate the sale and he alone knowing upon what terms he would effectuate the sale, secretly and through intermediaries purchased the minority stock without disclosure and at a price far below its value. And as little need is there for considering the line of authority which may be thought to be in opposition to this and which is sufficiently indicated by the following from 4 Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) par. 4031, where he says:

"Though there is a conflict in the decisions as to the right of directors and officers to purchase the shares of other stockholders, it is believed that the weight of authority sustains the right of these persons to deal in shares of the corporation where the transaction is free from fraud. The officers are not bound to acquaint a stockholder willing to sell his stock with facts which would enhance the price of the stock. The officers are trustees for the stockholders only as to the management of the corporation and not in their private dealings."

It is unnecessary, we repeat, to do this, for, by the history of the transactions as developed by the evidence and found by the court, it is clear that defendants acted with unimpeachable good faith.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

CALLAHAN v. DANZIGER et al.
(L. A. 3626.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 20, 1916.)

1. ATTACHMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 196—DISPOSITION—SALES
—“PERISHABLE PROPERTY.”

Only where attached property, because of its nature and inherent qualities, is liable to material depreciation in value from decay or other causes pending the end of litigation, can it be sold as “perishable property” without court order under the direct authority of Code Civ. Proc. § 547 (citing Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5303).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 642, 645; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 196.]

2. ATTACHMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 193—DISPOSITION—SALE—
—“PERISHABLE PROPERTY.”

Where, after attachment of oil drilling rigs and lumber, the case was not tried for over a year thereafter, the plaintiff held not to have brought the goods by his delay into the classification of “perishable goods,” which must be sold when attached under Code Civ. Proc. § 547, so as to prevent him, on recovering judgment, from including in his cost bill keeper's fees for the property, since after issue joined defendant could have had it set for trial under the express terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 594, and since it appeared that depreciation of the property had not resulted from any natural deterioration or action of the elements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 640, 641; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 193.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Perishable Property.]

3. ATTACHMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 198—DISPOSITION—SALES.

In such case, the proper remedy for defendants, had they desired the attached property sold at once, would have been to apply to the court for an order directing its sale, which, if for the interest of the parties, would have been granted under the direct terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 548.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 646, 647; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 198.]

4. ATTACHMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 193—DISPOSITION—SALES
—CUSTODY AND CARE OF PROPERTY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 540, providing that in attachment the writ must require the sheriff to attach and safely keep the attached property, held, a sheriff had no discretion to gather the property attached into one place in order to save keeper expense, where it appeared that the expense of caring for the property where it lay was a “necessary expense of keeping and preserving the property” under Pol. Code, §§ 4290, 4300b, authorizing courts to allow sheriffs such expenses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 640, 641; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 193.]

5. ATTACHMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 193—CUSTODY OF PROPERTY—FIXTURES.

Under Pol. Code, §§ 4290, 4300b, authorizing courts to allow sheriffs in attachment their necessary expense of keeping and preserving the property, where oil derrick, rigs, and frame house were attached they were regarded as personalty, and fees of a keeper thereof held properly allowed, although the property was more or less of a ponderous nature and annexed to the soil, since it was to a large extent capable of being dismantled and carted away.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 640, 641; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 193.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by W. H. Callahan against J. M. Danziger and another. After final judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal from an order denying their motion as to costs. Affirmed.

Rollin Laird and Geo. E. Whitaker, both of Bakersfield, for appellants. E. F. Brittan and Rowen Irwin, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Appeal from an order made after final judgment denying the appellants' motion to have the costs taxed by the court, and to strike from the cost bill certain items relating to keepers' fees.

The action in which this proceeding arose was commenced on December 18, 1911, to recover of the Lost Hills Syndicate, E. A. Wiltsee, J. M. Danziger, J. M. Kent, and others, the sum of $1,170.42, for wages and for moneys advanced. Personal service was made on defendants Danziger and Kent. On December 20, 1911, a writ of attachment was issued and levied upon personalty and fixtures consisting principally of 2,000 feet of lumber blown down from rigs, about 2,000 feet of rig timbers, 3 galvanized iron tanks, several sets of rig irons, shovels, picks, stoves and cooking utensils, bedding, and various implements used in connection with the business of drilling and mining for oil, and also a frame house (12x14), a derrick, 1 rig blown down, and 5 rigs in place. This property was scattered over a considerable area embracing two separate tracts of land, included within four sections in different townships and ranges in the Lost Hills district, also known as the Lost Hills Fields, of Kern county. The value of the attached property at the time of the seizure, according to the affidavits which were filed in the proceedings by the appellants and respondent, was estimated at $1,330 and $2,430, respectively. The sheriff took possession of the property upon receipt of the writ of attachment, and, without moving it from the land, placed keepers in charge who remained for a period of 437 days, or until March 22, 1913. At the rate of $2.50 per day for each tract of land, the total charge for this item of cost amounts to $2,185. On April 29, 1913, all the property which had been attached was sold at public auction under a writ of execution, and the sum of $550 was realized. Meanwhile service of summons was made upon defendant E. A. Wiltsee, by publication, and his default entered on August 26, 1912. Although the case was then at issue, it was not tried until March 21, 1913. The following day judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and respondent. The motion to tax the costs and strike out the items for keepers' charges was made by J. M. Danziger and J. M. Kent, the appellants herein, and rested, in part, "upon the grounds that said costs are exorbitant and excessive, and are not justified by the facts of the case, nor are they legitimate costs to be assessed against said defendants." The court denied the motion, and this appeal was taken.

[1, 2] 1. The appellants' first contention is that the keepers' services were unnecessary, as all "this property that was seized was perishable property" and should have been sold by the sheriff immediately after the seizure. In support of this contention, the appellants lay great stress upon the following definition of "perishable" from Anderson's Law Dictionary:

"Subject to speedy and natural decay. But where, as in the case of a levy upon personalty, the time before a sale can be made is necessarily long, the term may embrace property liable to material depreciation in value from other causes than decay."

See, also, Black's Law Dictionary; Witherspoon v. Cross, 135 Cal. 96, 67 Pac. 18.

The appellants also quote Bouvier's Law Dictionary, to the effect that "perishable property" means "goods which are lessened in value and become worse by being kept." But we do not think the mere fact that the property actually lessened in value and became worse by reason of having been kept is the criterion whether it should have been disposed of as perishable property. It is only where the property, because of its nature or inherent qualities, is liable to material depreciation in value from decay or other causes pending the termination of the litigation, that section 547 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes its sale without an order of court. See Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5303, and cases therein referred to. In the case of Witherspoon v. Cross, supra, it was contended that the sheriff was negligent in not having disposed of a stock of groceries, consisting principally of canned goods, coffee, flour, and farinaceous goods as perishable property; but the court, after referring to definitions on the subject similar to the foregoing, remarked that in the case before them "the time was not necessarily long," and the sheriff could not have anticipated that the attached property would remain in his hands for nearly a year. The decision continues:

"Had he immediately sold the whole stock as perishable, and the next day or the next week the action had been dismissed, or the attachment otherwise discharged, could it be doubted that the sheriff would be liable for the full value of the goods, and not merely for the proceeds of the sale?"

The appellants endeavor to show, however, that the respondent unnecessarily delayed the service of the summons upon defendant Wiltsee; that, after having effected service, he neglected for over four months to move to set the cause for trial; that at least his attorney knew the congested condition of the court's calendar and the improbability of an early trial; and that therefore "by his own conduct the plaintiff has brought the case within the definition of 'perishable goods.'" But, in our opinion, the affidavits do not show that the respondent failed to exercise due diligence in proceeding with the case. Nor does it appear that he had any reason to expect the litigation would be unduly protracted, or that the keepers' charges would finally become disproportionate to the value of the attached property. It is to be noted, too, that after the case was at issue, which was on August 26, 1912, the appellants, themselves, were entitled to have the issue set for trial had they been anxious to bring the litigation to a close. Code Civ. Proc. § 594. It also appears from the affidavits of the parties that the attached property was not, in fact, materially lessened in value on account of the action of the elements or natural deterioration. Although the actual cause of the loss in value is not disclosed in the record, it is not unreasonable to suppose, as the respondent suggests, that the value of the property was affected by the failure to make profitable discoveries of oil in the vicinity. But the value of the land for development purposes is not the measure of the sheriff's duty within the purview of section 547. We think it follows that the property held under attachment was not perishable.

[3] The remedy available to the appellants, had they actually desired to have the property sold before the termination of the action, would have been to apply to the court for an order directing its sale. Code Civ. Proc. § 548. If it had been made to appear satisfactorily to the court that the interest of the parties would have been subserved by a sale thereof, it would have been its duty to make such an order without regard to the question whether or not the property was perishable. Henry Cowell, etc., Co. v. Figel, 27 Cal. App. 11, 148 Pac. 796; Witherspoon v. Cross, supra.

[4] 2. The appellants contend, moreover, that the sheriff should at least have gathered the property together and safely stored it under lock and key at a nominal expense, rather than to leave it standing idle and exposed to the elements and subject to the heavy and unnecessary expense of maintaining keepers. It is pointed out that the effect of the course pursued by the sheriff has been to impose upon them a great hardship. "In addition," they say, "to having their property sacrificed, they are called upon to pay a sum almost four times in excess of its value and almost twice the amount sued for." But the sheriff had no discretion but to obey the writ commanding him to "attach and safely keep all the property." Code Civ. Proc. §

540. It is his duty to preserve such property at his peril. 6 C. J. 370, § 819. Of course, "he should make the expense of keeping it as light as possible consistent with its safe-keeping. * * * In keeping property under process, the same prudence and economy should be exercised as in the ordinary business affairs of life. No unnecessary expense should be incurred therein." Harlow on Sheriffs and Constables (3d Ed.) §§ 251, 252. It is unfortunate that in this case the sheriff's charges greatly exceed the value of the attached property, but it must be presumed in favor of the judgment herein that the superior court found that they were "necessary expenses in keeping and preserving" the property (Pol. Code, §§ 4290, 4300b), and we perceive no reason for holding otherwise. Furthermore, the owner of the property could have avoided the expense by having the attachment released under bond, or by applying to the court for an order of sale, as we have already pointed out. It appears from the affidavits that at the time of the attachment an inspection was made by the respondent, and disinterested parties in his behalf, for the express purpose of obtaining an estimate of the cost of tearing down, moving, and storing the property in one place so as to lessen the expense. These estimates ranged from $1,250 to $1,500. It also appears from the affidavits of the respondent and his attorney that the latter advised the former against the removal of the property as it was located on oil placer claims upon which assessment work was being performed.

[5] 3. The final point made by the appellants is that:

"The allowance for keepers' fees was not legal because a large portion of the property attached was real property."

It is contended that the frame house, derrick, and rigs were affixed to the soil and became a part of the realty. The appellants insist therefore that the property should have been attached by filing with the recorder copies of the writ, a description of the property, and notice of the attachment, and by leaving similar copies with an occupant of the place, if there is one; if not, then by posting the same in a conspicuous place on the property attached. Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 1. It is asserted in their affidavits that the expense of moving the balance of the attached property would have amounted to only a few hundred dollars, and that consequently the sole legal course for the sheriff to have pursued was to place the personality in storage and attach the fixtures as realty. But it clearly appears that, notwithstanding the property was more or less of a ponderous nature and physically annexed to the soil, it was to a large extent capable of being dismantled and carted away. As is said in Nisbet v. Clio Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 436, 444, 83 Pac. 1077, 1081:

"If a levy is made on immovable property, no keeper would ordinarily be necessary, but in our opinion when an attachment is levied on movable property, even though it be classed as fixtures, the sheriff must safely keep and preserve such property and is entitled to the necessary cost of doing so."

We think the facts and circumstances shown amply justified the court in denying the motion of the appellants; but, inasmuch as an appeal from the judgment against J. M. Danziger and one from the order denying his motion for a new trial are now pending in the District Court of Appeals from the Second District (L. A. 3785, 2d App. Dist. 2066), the enforcement of the judgment herein will stand subject to the outcome of the said appeals.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

SOUTHWESTERN SURETY INS. CO. v.
PILLSBURY et al., State Industrial Accident Commission. (S. F. 7454.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT — 373 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — NATURE OF INJURY — STATUTE — "BY ACCIDENT."

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 283) § 12, prior to amendment in 1915, providing for compensation for injury to an employé "by accident" in the course of employment, an employé in a lumber company, who, while pulling a timber from a pile, slipped or in some manner, wrenched his back, and fell down, was injured "by accident" within the statute, since these words are used in the statute in their ordinary meaning.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. — 373.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accident.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT — 405(4) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — PROCEEDINGS — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — INJURY.

In workmen's compensation proceedings, evidence that claimant, because of injury to his back, was disabled from March to August, and after resuming work again for two weeks he was again compelled to stop from sciatica, having never suffered from sciatica before the accident, his pain indicating the original lesion was somewhere in the sacroiliac region, gave some support to a finding of the commission that his second period of disability was caused by the original accident.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. — 405(4).]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT — 417(6) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — REVIEW BY COURT — QUESTIONS OF FACT.

A finding of the Industrial Commission as to the cause of disability, based upon conflicting testimony, will not be disturbed upon review.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. — 417(6).]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT — 416 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — COMMISSION'S ORDER OF AWARD.

An order of award by Industrial Commission is not invalid because not in terms limiting the time of payment to 240 weeks, since the statute itself makes that limitation and the order cannot be effective beyond that period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 416.]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT § 416—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — COMMISSION'S ORDER OF AWARD.

An order of award by an Industrial Commission is not invalid because it has appended an optional award to tender a surgical operation, with the right to discontinue payments if the claimant refuses such treatment, since the optional portion thereof may be disregarded by the employer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 416.]

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by H. J. Petersen, claimant, against the E. K. Wood Lumber Company, employer, and Southwestern Surety Insurance Company, insurer. Award for claimant, and the insurer brings certiorari. Affirmed.

H. L. Clayberg, J. W. Maloney, and Clayberg & Whitmore, all of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. A proceeding in certiorari to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding compensation to H. J. Petersen, who was injured while he was in the employ of the E. K. Wood Lumber Company at Oakland. The petitioner was the insurance carrier of the said lumber company.

Petersen was working as an employé of the E. K. Wood Lumber Company in the lumber yard of that corporation on March 13, 1914. He was assisting another man in loading 4x6 redwood timber on trucks. While pulling a piece of timber out from a pile, he either slipped or in some manner wrenched his back and fell down. He arose, put that stick of timber on the truck, and then could not move. He was assisted to his home and was under a doctor's care until the 10th of the following August when he returned to work. He testified that he worked until the 26th of August, when the "sciatica" came back again, and he was compelled to stop working. He received compensation from the petitioner at the rate of $13.12 per week from a time shortly after his injury until August 10th, the date of his return to work, and all of his doctor's bills, charges for drugs, and like expenses were also paid. After August 26th he received no compensation. His account of the manner of receiving the injury was corroborated by his co-worker, and medical testimony which we shall have occasion to discuss later was heard. The Industrial Accident Commission ordered the Southwestern Surety Insurance Company to pay $406.72 and $13.12 per week beginning March 31, 1915, until the termination of the disability or the further order of the Commission. There was a further order whereby the surety company was given the right to tender to Petersen an adequate and proper surgical operation at the company's expense to cure him and relieve him of his disability. It was the further order of the Commission that, in the event of such an offer, if Petersen should refuse to submit to the operation, or having submitted should neglect further to co-operate and aid in his cure, or if the treatment should result in the removal of his disability, or if he and the surety company should with the consent of the Commission agree upon a final settlement, the payment of the indemnity should thereupon cease.

Petitioner insists that there is no evidence that the injuries were received by Petersen as the result of an "accident" as provided in the law then in force; that even assuming that the applicant was disabled as the result of an accident, he had been entirely cured when he returned to work; that under the evidence the "sciatica" which caused Petersen to leave his work the second time could not be attributed to the injury; that the award is indefinite because the order provides for a termination of the indemnity only upon the ceasing of the disability or the further order of the Commission, while under the statute the period of disability may not be extended beyond 240 weeks; that if petitioner should offer to bear the expense of a surgical operation such expense would amount to a double indemnity unauthorized by the statute; and that the order with reference to the surgical operation is an unlawful effort to charge the surety company with the payment for surgical care long after the expiration of the period of 90 days following the date of the injury.

[1] Section 12 of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act provided, before its amendment in 1915, in part as follows:

"Liability for the compensation provided by this act, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever, shall, without regard to negligence, exist against an employer for any personal injury sustained by his employes by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment." St. 1913, p. 283. (The italics are ours.)

Petitioner seeks to apply to the word "accident" as employed in this statute the definition commonly used in cases relating to accident insurance. For example, Clidero v. Scottish Accident Insurance Co., 29 Scot. L. Rep. 303, is cited to the effect that where a man is injured while doing just what he meant to do and an unexpected and injurious result happens, the occurrence is not an "accident." Lehman v. Great Western Accident Association, 155 Iowa, 737, 133 N. W. 752, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 562, is also mentioned as authority for a similar limitation upon the meaning of the word "accident." That was a case in which the plaintiff had strained his side while he was bowling. He was denied relief. Recently this court has had occasion to declare the meaning of "accident" as used in policies of insurance, and in the opinion in the case of Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 156 Pac. 1029, the leading cases are cited and discussed. It was there said that:

"A person may do certain acts, the result of which acts may produce unforeseen consequences, and may produce what is commonly called accidental death, but the means are exactly what the man intended to use, and did use, and was prepared to use. The means were not accidental, but the result might be accidental."

Measured by this rule perhaps Petersen's injury was not due to "accident," but we must remember that in all policies of accident insurance the contract has reference to bodily injuries caused solely by external, violent, and accidental means. In one of the opinions in Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 706, 151 Pac. 398, 406, Mr. Justice Sloss, construing the very statute now before us, cited with approval the words of Lord Macnaghten in Fenton v. Thorley & Co., Ltd., [1903] A. C. 443, as follows:

"The expression 'accident' is used in the popular and ordinary sense of the word, as denoting an unlooked for mishap or an untoward event which is not expected or designed."

In that case it was held that the murder of a night watchman was an "accident" within the purview of the act, and similar rulings will be found in Trim Joint District School v. Kelly, W. C. & Ins. Rep. (1914) 359, and Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 156 Pac. 491-496. In the opinion in the Western Indemnity Case the definition of "accident" as given in Richards v. Travelers' Insurance Co., 89 Cal. 170-175, 26 Pac. 762, 763, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455, is also quoted. The word is there defined as:

"A casualty—something out of the usual course of events, and which happens suddenly and unexpectedly, and without any design on the part of the person injured."

In Price v. Occidental Life Insurance Co., 169 Cal. 800-802, 147 Pac. 1175, the definition of the Richards Case is cited with approval. When a more strict definition is required, that fact arises, usually in insurance cases, under the necessities imposed by the peculiar language of policies. In England under the former Compensation Act containing similar language to that used in our earlier statute "injury by accident" has been given broad construction in accordance with the ordinary conception of the words. In Fenton v. Thorley, supra, the question of the proper interpretation of the phraseology of the act was given exhaustive consideration by the House of Lords. The following language appears in the opinion:

"If a man, in lifting a weight or trying to move something not easily moved, were to strain a muscle, or rick his back, or rupture himself, the mishap, in ordinary parlance, would be described as an accident. Anybody would say that the man had met with an accident in lifting a weight or trying to move something too heavy for him."

In Clover, Clayton & Co. v. Hughes, 3 B. W. C. C. 275, the opinion (page 280) contains the following language:

"No doubt the ordinary accident is associated with something external; the bursting of a boiler, or an explosion in a mine, for example; but it may be merely from the man's own miscalculation, such as tripping and falling. Or it may be due both to internal and external conditions, as if a seaman were to faint in the rigging and tumble into the sea. I think it may also be something going wrong within the human frame itself, such as the straining of a muscle, or the breaking of a blood vessel. If that occurred when he was lifting a weight, it would be properly described as an accident. So, I think, rupturing an aneurism when tightening a nut with a spanner may be regarded as an accident."

[2, 3] We are convinced that the statute intended to give to the words used their ordinary meaning, and that the expression "accident arising out of and in the course of the employment" is broad enough to include the injury received by Petersen. There is no contention that he was engaged in anything outside of his ordinary employment when he was injured, so we pass to the next contention of petitioner that there is no substantial proof that the continuing disability had any connection with the accidental injury. Dr. Lohse, who testified upon this subject, gave it as his opinion that there was "some other cause producing a persistence of his sciatica than the injury." At the hearing it was agreed that a medical referee be appointed to report upon the condition of Petersen. Dr. Hyman accordingly made a report to the effect that the patient exhibited the signs commonly associated with "sciatica." The "X-ray" examination showed no lesion. The conclusions of Dr. Hyman were as follows:

"It is impossible to state the anatomic basis of the sciatic pain and the pain in the back complained of. Most of the signs of sacroiliac trauma are lacking, but the lesion cannot be excluded. Spinal injury, of which there is no evidence, can produce the same complex. The patient should be given the benefit of an attempted reduction under anæsthetic, followed by immobilization in plaster including the right thigh. If the lesion be sacroiliac slip, there will probably be complete recovery in 4 weeks. If not, the immobilization may or may not help him." (The italics are ours.)

Dr. Schaller, while declaring that certain symptoms pointed to psychoneurosis, also expressed the opinion that there were "a number of symptoms" which appeared to him to indicate "sacroiliac trouble." As the patient had never suffered from sciatica before the accident, and as the original lesion was as indicated by the pain somewhere in the sacroiliac region, there is some testimony to support the finding of the Commission. In other words, the finding that the condition in which Petersen was found to be at the time of the hearing resulted from the accident was based upon a determination drawn from conflicting testimony, and we may not disturb it.

[4] We do not think that the award is open to objection because the order fails in terms to limit the time of payment to 240 weeks. The statute itself makes that limitation, and of course the order cannot be effective beyond that period.

[5] The optional award may be beyond the powers of the Industrial Accident Commission, and doubtless by accepting it the petitioner would be compelled to pay for surgical services rendered later than the 90-day period following the accident; but the answer to these objections is found in the fact that it was optional. The petitioner was not compelled to accept it, nor to offer the suggested treatment to Petersen. The award is in complete form without reference to the second paragraph, which, so far as petitioner was concerned, was entirely optional.

It follows that the award must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

(Civ. 1592.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 24, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 20, 1916.)

1. INSURANCE — 87 — AGENCY FOR INSURER — AUTHORITY OF AGENT — "WRITTEN."

A letter from insurance company appointing an agent, providing, "Policies will be written at this office," gives the agent no authority to make a contract of insurance, since the word "written" means more than the physical act of filling in the blanks of a policy, insurance "written" being insurance contracted for; and the consummation of an insurance contract through such agent is dependent upon its ultimately being written at the company's general offices and delivered to assured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 116, 121; Dec. Dig. — 87.]

2. INSURANCE — 88 — AGENCY FOR INSURER — "GENERAL AGENT."

The authority to complete insurance contracts primarily differentiates a general agent having power to bind his principal from mere soliciting agents and other intermediaries operating between the insured and the insurer, who have authority only to initiate contracts, and consequently cannot bind their principals by anything they may say or do during the preliminary negotiations.

3. INSURANCE — 143(8) — CONTRACT — RIGHT TO REFORMATION.

Where insured, upon being advised by insurer that his automobile policy did not cover loss by direct collision, nevertheless elected to retain it, and neither requested the insurer to issue to him a different policy, nor offered to pay the premium requisite to insure against the additional risk of loss by direct collision, he accepted the policy as complying with his application, and could not have it reformed to cover such loss.

4. INSURANCE — 391 — ESTOPPEL OF INSURER TO DENY COVERAGE CLAIMED.

Where insured, after some debate, selected a rider form to be attached to his automobile policy to cover loss by direct collision, and shortly thereafter, on such loss occurring, was informed by the company that the rider did not cover it, the company by paying the loss because it was small, was not estopped to deny liability for future similar losses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by Maxwell Browne against the Commercial Union Assurance Company of London, England. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, and Norris & Warth, of Salinas, for appellant. Daugherty & Lacey, of Salinas, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an action upon a policy of automobile insurance in which the plaintiff prays for judgment in the sum of $1,350, the amount of a loss claimed to be due under the policy, and also prays that, if in the judgment of the court the policy is to be construed as not covering the damage claimed, it be reformed so that it shall do so. The judgment of the court reformed the policy as prayed and awarded the plaintiff the sum demanded. The appeal is by the defendant from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

As grounds for reversal of the judgment the appellant relies upon certain errors of law in the admission of evidence, and principally upon the proposition that the evidence introduced showed no grounds for reformation, but disclosed that the policy issued by the defendant to the plaintiff was in accordance with the latter's application, and that it admittedly did not cover the loss sought to be recovered.

There is little contradiction in the evidence concerning the main facts of the case, and it may be summarized as follows:

The defendant Commercial Union Assurance Company was represented in Salinas by one Joseph Bordges; his appointment being made by the following letter written to him by the defendant's manager:

Automobile Insurance

Dear Sir: On the nomination of special agent, Mr. F. J. H. Manning, you are hereby appointed agent of the Commercial Union Assurance Co., Ltd., for the transaction of automobile insurance in Salinas, subject to such instructions as may be given you from time to time by this office.

The rate of your commission will be 15 per cent.

Policies will be written at this office, and will be sent to you promptly upon receipt of application.

Yours truly, E. T. Niebling, Manager.

Bordges was supplied by the company with blank forms of application and certain slips to be attached to them, according to varying circumstances, called riders, one of which was designated as collision clause E. The form of policy issued by the company provided protection against certain risks in the body of it, and if protection against additional risks was desired one of these so-called riders would be attached to the application; the two documents thus attached constituting the demand for the insurance desired. These riders were, in fact, identical in language with the slip attached to the policy when issued, and which extended the terms of the policy so as to cover the additional risk. Applications for insurance were required to be made on the forms supplied by the company to its agent. Acting under his letter of appointment, Bordges received applications, forwarded them to the company at its office in San Francisco, which, if the risk applied for was accepted, issued a policy, sent it to Bordges, who delivered it to the assured, collecting the premium therefor. In May, 1912, the plaintiff, Maxwell Browne, applied to Bordges for insurance on his automobile, and Bordges proceeded in conjunction with Browne to fill out the application. The insurance desired was that covered by the main body of defendant's automobile policy, and also against damage to plaintiff's car caused by direct collision, to cover which it was necessary to attach both to the application and the policy a rider known either as collision clause A or B. During the process of filling out the application form the question arose as to which rider it would be necessary to attach to it, and some discussion was had between Browne, Bordges, and a third person in the office of Bordges, who carried a policy of automobile insurance. Bordges produced a form of rider known as collision clause E, the language of which, so far as it operated to designate the additional risk to be insured against over and above those provided for in the main body of the policy to be issued, is as follows:

"Damage to Property" Without Deduction.

"In consideration of ——— dollars additional premium, this policy also covers sums which the assured shall become liable to pay for damage to property (excepting to the property of others while in charge of the assured or of the assured's employees) or for legal expenses incurred with the consent of this company in connection therewith, through collision of the automobile herein described with any other automobile, vehicle, or object, either moving or stationary, during the period insured."

The meaning of this clause and its suitability to be attached to Browne's application in order to procure a policy affording him the protection he desired was discussed by Browne and Bordges. It appeared to both of them to be ambiguous in its meaning, but in the opinion of Bordges it was the proper rider to be attached, although he was evidently uncertain. Browne, who, though not a practicing lawyer, had been admitted to the bar and had had some former experience in connection with the insurance business other than automobile insurance, carefully read over collision clause E, and coincided with Bordges in his opinion that it was the correct rider to be attached to his application. On this subject Bordges testified:

"Collision clause E was examined by Mr. Browne at the time. He read it. We discussed the clause. Mr. Browne took part in that discussion. Mr. Browne expressed his opinion that this clause covered all the damage to the automobile. He thought the same as I did that that was the correct one. Browne after he had examined the clause agreed that this collision clause E which is attached to the application was sufficient for the purposes we had in mind. I knew and he knew that when the policy came back from the San Francisco office it would carry the same sort of form as was attached to the application."

Browne himself testified:

"He [Mr. Bordges] was not quite certain himself at first, and after reading it [collision clause E] over with Mr. Thorp and myself we all agreed that the language was sufficient to cover it."

The application as thus prepared was signed by Bordges and Browne, and forwarded to the San Francisco office of the company, which thereupon issued a policy in accordance with the application, attaching to it the rider "collision clause E," and the policy was delivered to Browne.

About a month thereafter Browne's automobile was injured by coming into collision with an obstacle in the road. He thereupon made a claim upon the company for his loss, and was informed by it that his policy did not cover such loss; that collision clause E only covered liability on the part of the assured to pay for damages inflicted upon the property of others resulting from a collision with his automobile, and not protection to him for loss which he might sustain by reason of such collision with his vehicle. Browne called at the office of the company in San Francisco, and there saw and talked with both Niebling, the manager, and William Ireland, the secretary. There is some contradiction in the testimony as to the exact conversation between Ireland and Browne, and Niebling and Browne, upon this visit, but there is none as to the fact that the amount of the loss claimed by Browne ($35) was paid by the company, and that Browne was then unequivocally informed of the contention of the defendant that his policy did not cover such a loss. Browne himself testifies:

"In June or July, 1912, they said they were not liable for any such accident. * * * Mr. Niebling told me at that time that the policy did not cover that kind of a loss to my machine."

Testifying as to what occurred during the negotiations for the settlement of this first loss, Ireland stated:

"On the occasion of the first accident I told him that the policy did not cover damage to his own car; that if he wished to have damage to his own car covered he should have taken out clause A or B * * * and pay the additional premium. * * * I showed him the riders which would be attached, and explained to him what the additional premium would be—

$120, in addition to the premium already shown on the policy."

Ireland was present at an interview between Browne and Niebling, as to which he testified:

"I repeated to Mr. Niebling what I had told Browne. Mr. Niebling said that if Bordges told him [Browne] that the policy covered that affair that we would recognize it in that case, as it was only a small claim. * * * We told Mr. Browne that future accidents of that sort would not be recognized. Mr. Browne said nothing in the way of assent. I remember Mr. Browne making this remark, that he understood our contention, and that he believed that that was the intention of the clause, but that it would not be sustained by the courts; that he had experience as an attorney. * * * Mr. Niebling finally told Mr. Browne that in view of the small loss in this accident at Colfax the company would stand that $35, but they would not stand anything further."

Niebling, testifying to his interview with Browne, said:

"I said 'I am not going to get into a controversy with you over $35. As an ex gratia payment I will make this payment, and will not make any payment in the future.' * * * Mr. Ireland, in my presence, explained to Mr. Browne that there was a different rate of premium when one had a rider attached covering damages to his own machine."

A. E. Field, an adjuster of the company who made the adjustment of this $35 loss, testified:

"I informed Browne in July, 1912, that the intent of the collision clause E was to indemnify the automobile owner against damage he might do to somebody else's property only, and that it was not intended to cover his own car."

This matter being thus adjusted, Browne took no step to either rescind his policy or request the company to issue to him a new one which would without question insure him against damage to his automobile through direct collision; and matters remained in that condition when, in September of the same year, while being driven by himself, his automobile came into collision with another vehicle and was damaged to the extent of $1,350. He made claim upon the company for this amount, and was refused payment upon the ground that in the opinion of the company such a loss was not covered by the policy. Browne called on Mr. Niebling to urge his claim. In testifying as to this interview Mr. Niebling said:

"My second conversation with Browne was in September after the second accident. He came in and said he claimed an accident, and also quoted some of the statements Mr. Ireland made to him, and I told him, 'Mr. Browne, you recall very distinctly what I told you several months ago, that this clause did not cover this kind of damage, and that, while I would make it ex gratia because it was too trifling an amount to get into a discussion about, you know perfectly well what I told you.' 'Well,' he said, 'I don't agree with you.' * * * When I told Browne to recall this previous conversation with him he did not deny that that was the previous conversation as I have stated. He merely denied that my conclusions were correct."

This testimony of Niebling is not denied by Browne, except Browne does deny that Niebling told him that the company would not in the future recognize such a loss.

Upon the facts as thus testified to it is the contention of the appellant that the policy issued to Browne was the one he applied for, that it does not cover the loss sought to be recovered, and that in any event, after the first accident and its settlement, Browne, by retaining his policy and not offering to pay the additional premium chargeable upon a policy of the character claimed to have been requested of Bordges, is in no position to ask for reformation of his policy, and that the court erred in finding in favor of Browne and giving judgment in his favor.

In support of the judgment it is urged by the respondent that the foregoing facts establish that Bordges was authorized to enter into contracts of insurance binding upon the defendant, that it was the intention of the parties by their contract to insure plaintiff against the damage admitted to have been sustained by him, and that he, having paid the premium demanded by the defendant, is entitled to have the policy reformed so as to cover such damage, and, further, that the defendant by its action in recognizing and paying the first claim, and not at that time canceling the policy, is now estopped to deny that the policy covers the loss sought to be recovered. In urging this last contention the respondent lays stress upon an incident that occurred during the negotiations leading up to the settlement of the first loss. Ireland at that time had computed that the additional premium on the policy claimed by Browne to have been contracted for by him would be $120, and so stated to the manager in the presence of Browne, whereupon, according to the testimony of the latter, Ireland said that, if the company settled with him for that particular accident, Browne would still owe the company money, to which Mr. Niebling replied:

"No; he has paid all he was asked for, and he evidently did not get what he should have got."

[1, 2] We think it clear under the evidence that Bordges, the Salinas agent of the defendant, had no authority to make a binding contract of insurance, and that the general language of the letter appointing him as agent "for the transaction of automobile insurance" is to be construed in connection with the further language of the letter, "Policies will be written at this office," and with the conduct of the parties under it. There is no question in this case of ostensible agency; and the evidence as to what took place between Bordges and the plaintiff at the time of the application for the policy clearly shows that Bordges was doing nothing more than preparing the plaintiff's application for the purpose of forwarding it to the insurance company. The word "written" in the phrase "Policies will be written at this office" evidently means something more than the mere physical act of filling in the blanks of an in-insurance policy. Insurance "written" is insurance contracted for. Consequently the consummation of the contract in controversy was dependent upon its ultimately being written at the general office in San Francisco. There was therefore no completed contract of insurance until the policy applied for was written and delivered; and it is settled that the authority to complete contracts primarily differentiates a general agent having power to bind his principal from mere soliciting agents and other intermediaries operating between the insured and the insurer, who have authority only to initiate contracts, and consequently cannot bind their principals by anything they may say or do during the preliminary negotiations (Sharman v. Continental Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 117, 138 Pac. 708, 52 L. R. A. [N. S.] 670).

[3] As to whether the applicant for insurance would have any legal remedy against the company other than that of rescission of his contract upon discovering the mistake in his application it is not necessary in this case to determine, in view of the evidence, which shows that upon discovering the mistake, and knowing that the defendant took the position that loss by direct collision was not covered by the policy, the plaintiff nevertheless elected to retain it, and neither requested the defendant to issue to him a different policy, nor offered to pay the premium requisite to insure against the risk which he claimed to have applied to be covered in the first place. By so doing he accepted the policy issued to him as complying with his application for insurance (Bostwick v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 116 Wis. 392, 89 N. W. 538, 540; 92 N. W. 247, 67 L. R. A. 705; Plympton v. Dunn, 148 Mass. 523, 20 N. E. 180; Madsen v. Maryland Casualty Co., 168 Cal. 204, 142 Pac. 51. We cannot distinguish such a case from that where, a person ordering goods of a particular kind, his vendor sends him goods of a different kind, and the purchaser, after discovering the mistake, elects to retain the goods delivered, and pays no more than the price of those goods.

[4] The respondent seeks to escape the effect of his inaction by the contention that he was justified by the answer made by defendant's manager to Mr. Ireland above quoted, to wit, "No; he has paid all he was asked for, but he evidently did not get what he should have got," in assuming that the company would in the future recognize liability for losses by direct collision as included within the plaintiff's policy. We think that no such inference can be drawn from the language used by Niebling. It was a remark addressed not to the plaintiff (although in his hearing), but to an officer of the company; and it was not made in reply to any offer of the plaintiff to pay the increased premium. It cannot be segregated from the remainder of the evidence concerning the discussion of which it was a part, and considered alone. It was Niebling's contention, known to the plaintiff, that the policy did not cover the loss for which claim had been made. The claim was for a small amount; and nothing was more natural than that the manager of the company recognizing that the plaintiff had been misled by the company's agent into applying for a policy different from the one he desired, should be willing to make plaintiff whole up to that time without additional charge; but no inference could properly be drawn therefrom that he was willing that such losses should be recognized in the future now that Browne no longer labored under any misapprehension or mistake. The true reason for the plaintiff's inaction suggested by the evidence is rather that he was still of the opinion that his policy covered the character of loss in dispute, and that, if the question ever came to be litigated, the courts would sustain his view. The circumstances attending the settlement by the company of Browne's first loss are entirely insufficient to constitute an estoppel as against the defendant, nor was such an estoppel an issue in the case.

For the reasons above set forth we are of the opinion that the findings of the court in favor of the plaintiff are not supported by the evidence, and that it erred in holding that the policy of insurance sued upon should be reformed, that the defendant was estopped to deny that it was liable for the amount claimed by plaintiff, and in giving judgment in his favor.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring notices of motion for new trial to be made within ten days after notice of judgment or within ten days after verdict if the trial was by jury, a notice given over ten days after the verdict fixing the damages in a condemnation case, but within ten days after the court's entry of judgment as to public use, etc., is in time.

2. TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 387(1)—DECISION—STATUTE.

The court's oral opinion as to public use and necessity delivered during the trial was not equivalent to the written decision he was required to make and file under Code Civ. Proc. § 632.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, against James J. Stevinson, a corporation, and others. From an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the question of damages, the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James F. Peck, of Oakland, and Walter Shelton and David L. Levy, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, and Frank H. Short, of Fresno, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action was commenced to condemn an easement in the land of defendants. In the trial of the case the evidence as to the issues properly triable by the court, to wit, the issue of public use and the issue of public necessity, were first heard by the court, and the court orally announced its conclusion in favor of plaintiff, and thereupon a jury was impaneled and heard the evidence upon the issue of damages, and a verdict was returned thereon on November 18, 1915, as follows:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled action, hereby ascertain and assess the damages to the 2,407.27 acres of swamp and overflowed land described in the complaint at the sum of $425,000.00. A. E. Owen, Foreman."

Indorsed:

"Filed this 18th day of November, A. D. 1915. P. J. Thornton, Clerk. Entered November 18, 1915. P. J. Thornton, County Clerk."

On November 29, 1915, the trial judge made and filed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the same day entered judgment, of which notice was duly given to defendant December 2, 1915. The judgment recites the fact that a jury had been—

"duly impaneled to try the issue as to damages, and said matter having been duly tried, and the jury having duly rendered its verdict in the words and figures as follows, to wit: [Copy of verdict.] * * * Now, therefore, by reason of the law and the findings, verdict, and stipulation aforesaid, it is by the court ordered, adjudged, and decreed," etc.

No judgment on the verdict other than as above shown was entered.

Notice of intention by plaintiff to move for a new trial as to the issue of fact found by the jury was served on December 3, 1915, and filed December 4, 1915. The motion came on to be heard December 22, 1915, and was objected to by defendant on the ground that no notice of intention to move for a new trial was served or filed "within the time provided by law, to wit, within ten days after the date of the verdict of the jury in the above-entitled case." The objections were overruled, the motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial was denied, and the motion for a new trial was granted.

[1] The question is: Did the time for giving notice of intention to move for a new trial begin to run at the date of the verdict, November 1, 1915, or upon entry of findings and judgment, on November 29, 1915?

The question involves the construction to be given to section 659, Code of Civil Procedure, which reads:

"The party intending to move for a new trial must, within ten days after receiving notice of the entry of the judgment, or within ten days after verdict, if the trial was by jury, file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention to move for a new trial."

It is contended by appellants that this section of the Code, as it read when the order was made and as it now reads (amendment of 1915 [St. 1915, p. 201]), differs materially from former statutes under which the decisions relied upon by respondent were given. By the amendment of 1874 the section read as follows:

"The party intending to move for a new trial must, within ten days after the verdict of the jury, if the action were tried by a jury, or after notice of the decision of the court or referee, if the action were tried without a jury, file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention," etc. Code Amendments, 1873-74, p. 315.

In 1907 the section was made to read as follows:

"The party intending to move for a new trial must, within ten days after receiving notice of the entry of the judgment, file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention, designating the grounds," etc.

—thus substituting "receiving notice of the entry of the judgment" for the verdict of the jury, if the action were tried by a jury, or after notice of the decision of the court or referee, if the action were tried without a jury." Stats. 1907, p. 717. The amendment of 1915 makes the action read substantially the same as it read in 1874, except the language now is "within ten days after verdict, if the trial was by jury," instead of "within ten days after the verdict of the jury, if the action was tried by a jury," as in 1874. Section 195 of the Practice Act (St. 1851, p. 81 as amended by St. 1865-66, p. 845) read as follows:

"The party intending to move for a new trial shall give notice of the same as follows: When the action has been tried by a jury, within five days after the rendition of the verdict; and when tried by a commissioner, referee, or by the court, within ten days after receiving written notice of the filing of the findings of the commissioner, referee, or court, when written findings are filed by the court, or of the rendering of the decision when no findings are filed. * * *

By the amendment of 1874 the phraseology of the Practice Act "if the action were tried by a jury" was retained, and the only substantial difference made was to extend the time to ten days within which to file and serve the notice of intention and to make the time applicable alike to the trial by jury, referee, and the court. In the act of 1907 all reference in previous statutes to the trial by jury, referee, commissioner, and the court was eliminated, and the time when the notice was to be given began with "notice of the entry of the judgment." The amendment in 1915 goes back to the form of expression found in the Practice Act and in the act of 1874, except in the particular already pointed out.

It seems to us that the Legislature did not mean by this change in phraseology to introduce a new or different procedure from that pursued under the form of expression used in the Practice Act or in the statute of 1874. Flateau v. Lubeck, 24 Cal. 364, was a case where it appeared that "the action was tried by a jury," and it was held that the statute required notice "within five days after rendition of the verdict where the action has been tried by a jury," and, as no notice was given, the statement could not be considered. Allen v. Hill, 16 Cal. 113, was an action in quo warranto to determine the right to vote certain shares of a corporation. Certain questions were submitted to a jury which we infer from the report of the case involved all the material issues that were raised in the action. The jury rendered their verdict on January 14, 1860. The cause "was held open" until January 16th, and on that day the attorney for the people presented and filed a motion for judgment and to set aside the special findings of the jury. This motion was argued on January 19th, and on January 20th judgment was rendered for defendant. The record did not contain any service of notice of this motion. After judgment, and on January 21, 1860, relator filed and served a motion for a new trial, on the grounds that the special verdict and the judgment were contrary to law and the evidence, etc. Motion denied, and relator appealed. Said the court:

"The notice of motion for a new trial was not given in time, and the proceedings based upon such notice must therefore be discharged. The trial terminated with the rendition of the verdict, and the notice should have been given within two days thereafter. [At that time the statute so provided.] It is urged that, as the verdict was special, it was necessary to invoke the action of the court before a judgment could be entered upon it, and that therefore the trial itself did not in contemplation of law terminate until the judgment was rendered. We cannot assent to this view. The facts were settled by the verdict, and it only remained for the court to pronounce the conclusion of the law upon the facts found. If the court erred in this respect, the error is a proper subject for review, and a motion for a new trial was unnecessary. If the verdict was not satisfactory, the right to correct it did not depend upon the judgment, and the steps for that purpose should have been taken within the time limited by the statute."

The only issues of fact involved in the case were those submitted to and found upon by the jury. Nothing remained to be done but enter judgment. The trial was completed upon the coming in of the verdict.

In Peabody v. Phelps, 9 Cal. 213, the action was to recover the price paid for certain land as to which the seller was alleged to have made false and fraudulent representations. The cause was referred to a referee "to find the facts and report a judgment." On March 8, 1856, the referee reported a judgment for plaintiff for the amount claimed, and judgment was entered on that day, which was in vacation. On appeal the judgment was reversed because rendered in vacation. At the following term, on filing the remittitur, the report of the referee was confirmed, and, on March 28, 1857, judgment was entered for plaintiff. Counsel for defendant obtained an order from the court directing the referee to certify the evidence taken before him, which being reported, a statement was prepared and notice given to set aside the report. It was contended that the reversal of the judgment originally entered could not operate to reopen the case beyond the error indicated by the reversal, that the right of appellant to a statement of the evidence, etc., had previously been lost, and that such right was not dependent on the time of the entry of judgment, but on the trial. It was hence urged that the time within which a motion for a new trial could be made began to run from the filing of the report of the referee when first filed (March 8, 1856), and not from March 28, 1857, after the reversal of the judgment. It was held that the right of appellant to make his motion and prepare his statement dated from the entry of the judgment on the 28th day of March, 1857, and not from the filing of the report or the trial before the referee. "The judgment previously entered by the clerk in vacation, reversed on appeal, was a nullity," said the court, "and could not affect the appellant's right to move for the rendition of judgment by the court." The court points out that the time within which a notice of a motion must be filed to set aside the report of a referee, and a statement be prepared for that purpose, will depend upon the character of the reference; whether it be special, to report facts, or general, to report upon the whole issue.

"Upon facts found, whether by report of the referee or special verdict of a jury, the direct action of the court must be invoked before judgment can be entered. Though the trial in such cases has ended, judgment does not follow immediately as a matter of course; and the time within which the notice of motion to set aside the report or verdict must be given should be the same in the two cases, and date from the filing of the report or the rendition of the verdict."

If we rightly understand these cases, they hold that, where the action is tried by a jury—and by action is meant all the issues in the case—the time for serving and filing notice of intention begins to run when the verdict is rendered. But we find no cases under the earlier statute holding that, where some special issue, not determinative of the case, has been tried by a jury, the time within which to serve and file notice of intention begins to run upon the rendition of the verdict upon such special issue. The reason for the running of the time upon the rendition of the verdict is found in what was said in Allen v. Hill, supra, namely:

"The trial terminated with the rendition of the verdict; * * * it only remained for the court to pronounce the conclusion of the law upon the facts found."

Obviously this could not be the case where issues remained to be determined by the court. It was so held in Bates v. Gage, 49 Cal. 126, which was a case in equity, and it is the settled rule in that class of cases that, where special issues are submitted to a jury, their findings are merely advisory, and the trial is not terminated when the jury render a verdict, but where the court renders judgment.

James v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 107, 20 Pac. 241, was a proceeding for revocation of letters of administration. The trial judge submitted certain issues to a jury which were found upon, but the court took no further action in the matter, and the case had not been decided. An application for a writ of mandate to compel the court to settle a statement on motion for a new trial was denied; the Supreme Court holding that the verdict of the jury was not a verdict "in an action tried by a jury within the meaning of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but was merely advisory to the judge and of no force or effect until adopted by him." The motion was held premature.

Reclamation District No. 556 v. Thisby, 131 Cal. 572, 63 Pac. 918, was a condemnation case. Two actions were tried together and disposed of upon a single record. "Certain issues were submitted to a jury, and its verdict thereon adopted by the court, and additional findings were made upon other issues. Upon these findings the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and afterwards denied the defendant's motions for a new trial. From these orders defendants have appealed." Respondent contended that the court was without jurisdiction to entertain the motion for a new trial, "inasmuch as no proper notice of intention to make such motion had been given." The notice of intention was served and filed within ten days after the jury had given their answers to the special issues submitted to them, and it was held that the notice was premature, since the decision of the court was not made until six months later. The court said:

"Although certain special issues were submitted to a jury, these issues formed only a portion of the controversy between the parties to the actions, and the remaining issues were tried by the court, and findings of fact made by it thereon, upon which, together with the answers of the jury to the questions submitted to them the court rendered its judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The 'actions' were therefore tried by the court, and under section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, until the court had rendered its decision, it was not competent for either party to give notice of its intention to move for a new trial. The notices of intention to move for a new trial were given and filed November 1, 1897, while the decision by the court was not made until April 21, 1898. These notices were within ten days after the jury had given their answers to the special issues submitted to them, but, as the 'actions' were not tried by a jury, the notices were premature and gave to the court no power to act upon the motions which should thereafter be made under the notices. Bates v. Gage, 49 Cal. 126; Bell v. Marsh, 80

Cal. 411 [22 Pac. 170]. No judgment could have been rendered in the case at the time the jury rendered its verdict, and the trial of the action was not concluded until the court had rendered its 'decision' upon all of the issues submitted to it. 'A case has not been tried until all the issues have been disposed of, and there has been no decision until the court has passed upon the facts and drawn its conclusions of law therefrom.' Bell v. Marsh, supra; Crin v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478 [26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491]; Broder v. Conklin, 98 Cal. 360 [33 Pac. 211]. The rule of procedure for causes tried by the court is the same whether they are cases in equity or actions at law. Hastings v. Hastings, 31 Cal. 95."

In the somewhat similar case of Fountain Water Co. v. Dougherty, 134 Cal. 376, 66 Pac. 316, the same rule was applied in a condemnation case.

Beaulieu Vineyard et al. v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 242, 91 Pac. 1015, was prohibition to restrain the court from enforcing an order authorizing plaintiff to take possession and use certain lands which had been condemned in an action brought by the San Francisco, Vallejo & Napa Valley Railroad against petitioners. Issues in the case relating to the damages for the taking were submitted to a jury, and their answers were returned. The court reserved to itself the question of necessity for the taking, and did not pass upon that issue until after the verdict was rendered. It was said in the opinion that the more orderly procedure would be for the court to find upon the question of necessity before the issue of compensation is submitted to the jury.

"But," said the court, "if the jury have sufficient information as to the proposed action of the court * * * to act intelligently upon the issue of compensation and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant, the reservation by the court of the decision of the question of necessity until after the verdict is rendered is not even erroneous, much less in excess of jurisdiction"—citing City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585.

Appellant places great stress upon the language of section 659, "if the trial was by jury," claiming that the term "trial" means the determination by the jury of any issue of fact; that is, whenever, in an action or special proceeding, an issue of fact is submitted to and found upon by a jury, their verdict on that issue is a trial by jury as contemplated by the statute, and, if the losing party desires to have the verdict reviewed by a new trial, he must serve and file his notice of intention "within ten days after the verdict," regardless of the termination of the trial or the action of the court on issues not submitted to the jury and remaining undisposed of. Section 656, Code of Civil Procedure, is cited as supporting this contention. It reads:

"A new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision by a jury, court or referee."

We do not understand this section as defining what is meant by a trial. We do not think that the determination by a jury of some single, isolated issue of fact in a case is "the trial by jury" referred to in section

659, where there remain other issues undisposed of. It may be that a single issue of fact is such as may be set aside when a new trial is sought under the Code, but the question still remains unanswered as to when the time begins to run against the motion, except as it is answered by section 659, where we are told that the motion of intention must be made "after verdict, if the trial was by jury." We cannot believe that in changing the phraseology used in the amendment of 1915 the Legislature intended that the word "trial," used in the section, should mean anything different from the words "the action was tried" found in former statutes. When the Legislature used the term "trial," it must, we think, have intended to refer to the action being tried, and not alone to some one or more issues of fact to be submitted to the jury not decisive of the case; that it was not intended to introduce a rule at variance with the procedure of half a century.

The notice of intention must be given "within ten days after receiving notice of the entry of judgment, or within ten days after verdict, if the trial was by jury," etc. "Entry of judgment" presupposes a "trial," and it would seem reasonable that when the word "trial" is used in connection with the verdict it means a trial in the true sense; i. e., a determination of all the issues and such determination as will authorize judgment to be entered.

As was said in Bell v. Marsh, 80 Cal. 411, 22 Pac. 170:

"A case has not been tried until all the issues have been disposed of."

In order to constitute a trial, all the issues raised by the pleadings must be actually or ostensibly disposed of. There must be such proceedings, after joinder of issue upon the facts, as are so far determinative of the issues that final judgment is the appropriate judicial conclusion thereof. Thus, where only a part of the issues were disposed of, and the rest were reserved, it was held there was no trial. 1 Hayne, New Trial, § 1, par. 2. Mr. Hayne says:

"Where only a part of the issues are submitted to a jury, the notice of intention should not be given until all the issues have been disposed of." 1 Hayne on New Trial, § 18, par. 1.

In Kiel v. Reay, 50 Cal. 61, the action was on certain promissory notes, and certain special issues were submitted to a jury, but did not include the issue made by the pleadings as to whether plaintiff was the owner and holder of the notes; the verdict responded only to the special issues submitted, there having been no general verdict. A motion for judgment on the verdict was granted, but the Supreme Court reversed the judgment, holding that a material issue raised by the pleadings had not been disposed of, and the result was simply a mistrial.

In Crowther v. Rowlandson, 27 Cal. 377, 385, the court said:

"By the one hundred and ninety-fifth section of the act of 1863, it is provided that, when 'an action has been tried by the court, or by a commissioner or referee,' the party intending to move for a new trial shall give a written notice thereof within ten days after receiving written notice of the findings of the judge, or the report of the commissioner or referee. The issues in this case were tried in part by the court and were in part committed for trial to a referee; and therefore the case does not fall within either of the express allotments of the section. But it is apparent that the intention of the Legislature was that proceedings in new trial should be postponed until cases had been 'tried.' The trial of this case was not complete until the final report of the referee was filed."

The action was to set aside a conveyance alleged to have been made when the grantor was insane. The same rule was announced in Hinds v. Gage, 56 Cal. 486, which was a case for an accounting between parties, and also in Duff v. Duff, 71 Cal. 513, 12 Pac. 570.

The rule in equity cases is, as we have seen, and as Mr. Hayne states it, supra, and he says:

"It is manifest that the equity rule must be held to apply in common-law cases; for, if judgment be entered upon a special verdict which has not disposed of all the issues, there will be a mistrial."

In Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238, the court submitted certain issues to the jury and reserved certain other issues to itself which, after the verdict was rendered, were disposed of by findings of its own. On March 22, 1912, the verdict was rendered and the clerk entered judgment thereon. The court said:

"We regard the judgment entered by the clerk on March 23, 1912, as premature and without authority or effect; for, upon the facts stated, the trial was not then concluded."

It seems quite clear to us that unless, as appellant stoutly contends, the term "trial," as used in section 659, means any issue submitted to the jury, and does not mean the determination of all the issues, the contention of appellant cannot be sustained. That the term has no such broad meaning we are satisfied. We need not concern ourselves with the reason for the decisions that in condemnation cases the questions of use and necessity are exclusively for the court to determine. Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., supra. These are issues of fact, though withheld from the jury, and must be determined by the court before final judgment of condemnation can be entered, and until found upon by the court there is no "trial" of the action as contemplated by section 659, Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] Although the judge announced orally from the bench his conclusion as to the questions of use and necessity, this was in no legal sense equivalent to findings which the law required him to make, and which were not made until after the jury had rendered their verdict. Section 632, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

"Upon the trial of a question of fact by the court, its decision must be given in writing and filed with the clerk within 30 days after the cause is submitted for decision."

"The opinion of the court, expressed from the bench in deciding a case, is no part of its decision." American, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 499, 126 Pac. 497.

In the formal findings of fact and conclusions of law are to be found the only legal expression of the views of the court. Montecito Valley Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 595, 77 Pac. 1113; Sullivan v. Washburn & Moen, etc., Co., 139 Cal. 257, 259, 72 Pac. 992.

"Until the decision itself has been entered in the minutes, or reduced to writing by the judge, and signed by him, and filed with the clerk, the case has not been tried to a legal intent." Hastings v. Hastings, 31 Cal. 95.

The order granting the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

It appears from the petition that in the trial of said action judgment passed for defendant and plaintiffs appealed. The judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court and remittitur was filed with the clerk of said superior court on July 31, 1914. It is alleged in the petition that appellant in said appeal served upon petitioner a memorandum of costs on October (?) 24, 1914, "and filed the same with the clerk of said court on the 26th day of August, 1914," a copy of which said memorandum is made part of the petition as Exhibit A; that, on August 27, 1914, petitioner served upon plaintiffs in said action and, on August 28, 1914, filed with the said court a motion and notice of motion to tax costs on said appeal, a copy of which is made part of the petition attached to Exhibit A, and also filed therewith the affidavit of James F. Peck (petitioner's attorney); that said motion came on to be heard on January 26, 1915, at which time the affidavit of Edward F. Treadwell (attorney for respondents) was filed, both said affidavits being made part of said petition; that, on April 5, 1915, the said court made an order denying said motion to tax costs, also made part of the petitioner's Exhibit A; that no notice of said order was served on petitioner or its attorney, and petitioner and its attorney had no knowledge of the making of said order until July 12, 1915; that, on July 17, 1915, petitioner (defendant in said action) served upon plaintiffs therein a bill of exceptions which is made part of the petition as Exhibit A "and no amendments were proposed to said bill of exceptions and the same was returned to and received by the clerk of the court for settlement on the 29th day of July, 1915"; said bill of exceptions bears the indorsement of service upon plaintiffs' attorneys July 17, 1915; that said bill of exceptions came on to be heard September 1, 1915; that affidavits of said Treadwell and said Peck were read to the court and were made part of the petition; that thereupon plaintiffs' attorney objected to any settlement of said bill of exceptions and the matter was submitted to the court to settle the said bill if said objections were overruled; that, on January 31, 1916, "the court refused and denied and ever since has refused and denied the right of petitioner herein to have said bill of exceptions settled"; that no notice was ever served by plaintiffs on defendant of the said order of said court of April 5, 1915, denying said motion to tax costs.

Mr. Treadwell made affidavit that no bill of exceptions to said order of April 5, 1915, was ever served on counsel for plaintiffs until July 17, 1915; that, after the making of said order and on May 26, 1915, affiant inclosed in an envelope, postage prepaid, and directed to Mr. James F. Peck, Crocker building, San Francisco, and deposited the same in the post office of said city, the following notice:

"May 26, 1915.

"Mr. James F. Peck, Crocker Building, San Francisco, Cal. Dear Sir: The costs on plaintiff's appeal, in the case of Turner v. East Side Canal & Irrigation Company, amount to nine hundred and sixty-three dollars and ten cents ($963.10). Will you kindly have your client send a check for the same at once?"

"Yours truly, Edward F. Treadwell."

Mr. Peck made affidavit that, on May 27, 1915:

"He had a conversation by telephone with P. J. Thornton, the county clerk of Merced county and ex officio clerk of the superior court of Merced county. That in said conversation the affiant inquired of said clerk as to whether or not the said court made any decision or determination of the motion, theretofore submitted to said court, to tax costs of the plaintiff on appeal in the above-entitled case; that the said clerk then informed affiant that no decision or order had been made by said court on said motion or the subject thereof, whereupon affiant requested the clerk to carefully examine the records for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, and the clerk said he would do so, and the clerk thereafter on said day stated over the telephone that no order or decision had been made by said court on said motion to tax costs."

It is then stated that, within 10 days before service of said proposed bill of exceptions (which was on July 15, 1915), affiant was informed by letter written by said clerk informing affiant of the fact of the court's order and decision "on said motion to tax costs" and reciting the fact of the mistake of said clerk.

"And affiant never had any knowledge of any order or decision upon said motion, and, at all times herein mentioned, the said Edward F. Treadwell, attorney for plaintiffs, had his law office in the city and county of San Francisco."

It thus appears that the cost bill was duly served and filed, objections thereto made on motion to tax costs, a hearing had thereon, and the matter submitted to the court for decision. Thereafter, to wit, on April 5, 1915, the court made its order denying said motion to tax costs. On May 26, 1915, Mr. Treadwell, attorney for plaintiffs in said action, mailed to Mr. Peck, defendants' attorney therein, the letter above set forth. The next day, May 27, 1915, Mr. Peck called up the clerk of the court to ascertain whether the court had made any order in the matter of the cost bill, as we have above set forth, and was informed that no order had been made. Nothing further occurred in the matter until "within 10 days before service of said proposed bill of exceptions" (which was on July 15, 1915), when Mr. Peck was informed by letter written by said clerk that the latter had made a mistake and informing Mr. Peck of the fact of the court's order and decision "on said motion to tax costs." Upon this state of facts the bill of exceptions was presented to the court for settlement and denied, and the writ of mandate is sought to compel the court to settle said bill of exceptions

In explanation of its action the court said:

"In order that you may know my reasons for ruling in the matter of the settlement of a bill of exceptions in the case of Turner v. East Side Canal Co., etc., I will simply state that I acted upon the authority of the case of Heinlen v. Heilbron, 94 Cal. 636, 30 Pac. 8. The affidavit states positively that the office of defendants' attorney was at the place to which the notice was directed—Crocker building, etc. This constitutes personal service where its receipt is not denied and every opportunity given to make denial."

We think there can be no doubt of the receipt of Mr. Treadwell's letter by Mr. Peck. It was deposited in the post office at San Francisco on May 26, 1915, directed to Mr. Peck in the building where he had his office, the postage prepaid, and on the next day Mr. Peck called up the clerk to learn whether an order had been made on the motion to tax costs. In his affidavit he does not deny its receipt. The question then is, Was the letter of Mr. Treadwell sufficient to impart legal notice to Mr. Peck that the court had made the order of April 5, 1915? Section 649 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "A bill containing the exception to any decision may be presented to the court, or judge, for settlement at any time after the decision is made, but the same must be presented within 10 days after written notice of making such decision," etc. Section 1012 of the same Code provides that: "Service by mail may be made, where the person making the service, and the person on whom it is made, reside or have their offices in different places, between which there is a regular communication by mail," and section 1015, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that " * * * In all cases where a party has an attorney in the action or proceeding, the services of papers, when required, must be upon the attorney instead of the party, except," etc.

"Service by mail is good only where the person making the service and the person on whom it is to be made reside in different places, between which there is regular mail communication." Linforth v. White, 129 Cal. 188, 191, 61 Pac. 910; Thompson v. Brannan, 76 Cal. 618, 18 Pac. 783; Life Ins. Co. v. Shepardson, 76 Cal. 376, 18 Pac. 398.

Section 1011, Code of Civil Procedure, however, provides that: "The service may be personal, by delivery to the party or attorney on whom service is required to be made," and points out how the service is to be made if upon an attorney and also if upon a party. It was said, in Heinlen v. Heilbron, 94 Cal. 636, 640, 30 Pac. 8:

"The 'delivery' which constitutes a personal service under section 1011 need not be made by the individual who is attempting to make the service, but can be effected through a clerk or messenger, and through any agency by which a 'delivery' can be made, and when the notice is so delivered, the service becomes a personal service."

In this case the notice was a notice of appeal which was attempted to be served through the mail and there was controversy as to whether the package was directed to the place of residence of respondent's attorney, a question the court seems not to have regarded as important. It appeared from the affidavit of respondent's attorney that he received a copy of the notice of appeal at his office and residence in San José, through the agency of the post office and this, said the court, "is equivalent to an admission of service indorsed by him upon the original notice, and establishes that there had been a personal service upon him of such notice, and that the court has thereby obtained jurisdiction of the appeal." It was said further that "jurisdiction, however, as has frequently been held, does not depend upon the proof of service, but upon the fact that service has been made" (citing In re Newman, 75 Cal. 220, 16 Pac. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 Pac. 220). In Shearman v. Jorgensen, 106 Cal. 433, 39 Pac. 863, it was held that the receipt of a notice served by mail "amounts to a personal service." We think it must be held that Mr. Treadwell's letter was delivered to Mr. Peck, but there still remains the important question whether the letter constituted such notice of the order of April 5, 1915, as is contemplated by the statute.

Petitioner's view of the matter is thus expressed:

"We claim that had the letter been actually personally delivered it would not have answered the statute as to notice because of its form. The letter was a demand for payment, and inferentially referred to an order. It did not expressly state that an order, denying the motion to tax costs, had been made by the court, nor did it give any date as to when the costs were taxed. It was not addressed to any person in a representative capacity, as attorney, nor was the same signed by any person as attorney. In itself it did not, nor was it intended to, convey notice. That was not its purpose. It was not entitled in any case or any court, nor was it filed among the records of the case. In passing upon the legal value of this dunning letter as a purported notice, the function of a notice in such a case must be considered. It is not primarily to inform a party of the fact that a certain order was made, but to notify him that his time, within which to perform a certain act, has begun to run, and it should show clearly and explicitly on its face that its purpose was to start the tolling. The statute providing for written notices, as in this case provided, is the equivalent of a stipulation that the party to be charged with the performance of an act may perform such act any time prior to and within 10 days after service of the statutory formal notice."

We think there is much force in the views thus expressed. It was said, in Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 359, 61 Pac. 1123, speaking of section 659, Code of Civil Procedure:

"Written notice of filing of decision is in all cases required, unless waived by facts appearing in the records, files, or minutes of the court; and it follows that actual notice or knowledge, other than by written notice, is insufficient in any case unless it appears, from facts thus evidenced, that written notice was waived." Hughes Mfg., etc., Co. v. Elliott, 167 Cal. 494, 140 Pac. 17.

In Byrne v. Hudson, 127 Cal. 254, at page 257, 59 Pac. 597, at page 593, the judgment provided that the plaintiff should pay the money within 20 days "after written notice" of the entry of the judgment. The court said:

"We think, therefore, that as appellant's right in the premises depended upon the commencement of the running of a certain period of time mentioned in the judgment, and as her title was to be forfeited unless a certain act was done within that period of time, she was entitled to a notice expressly intended for the purpose of starting the period of time mentioned in the judgment, and that a mere incidental recital in a notice of a motion for a new trial, given for an entirely different purpose, was not a sufficient compliance with the terms of the judgment."

The statute is no less imperative than a judgment using like terms, and if we substitute the statute for the judgment the rule above stated meets this case. It certainly is open to doubt whether Mr. Treadwell intended his letter to be understood by Mr. Peck as the statutory notice that on a certain day the court made a certain order in a certain case. The writer seems rather to have assumed knowledge of the fact by Mr. Peck and on that assumption called upon him for payment. If there is doubt as to the intention of the writer or as to the legal effect of his language it should be resolved against him. That Mr. Peck was not satisfied as to the meaning of the letter is shown by his calling up the clerk of the court for confirmation on this doubtful matter, and he was informed by the clerk that no such order had been made. We think he was justified in waiting until he had explicit notice, such as the statute requires, before presenting his bill of exceptions. The cost bill amounted to $963.10. It may be invulnerable, but we think it much better that the objections to it be given a hearing on the merits than to sanction a practice which, in our opinion, would be an infraction of the spirit and letter of the statute. It appears from the petition that defendant in the action, petitioner here, has duly perfected its appeal to this court from said order, and said bill of exceptions was presented as part of the record on said appeal. The order of April 5, 1915, is not an appealable order.

We think petitioner is entitled to the peremptory writ commanding respondent, the judge of the superior court of Merced county, to settle said bill of exceptions and it is so ordered.

We concur: HART, J.; ELLISON, Judge pro tem.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. On petition for rehearing in the above entitled case, our attention is called to an omission in the letter of Edward F. Treadwell to James F. Peck, of May 26, 1915, referred to in the opinion. By inadvertence the words "as taxed by the court" were omitted and, to make the copy of the letter complete, should be inserted after the word "appeal."

We do not think that the phrase affects in any material respect our conclusions and the petition is, therefore, denied.

Evidence of adjustment of splints and bandages upon injured arm of plaintiff in manner so tight that no space was left for enlargement of the arm due to swelling, by reason of which the arm was severely injured, with notice to defendant of such condition an hour after adjustment, and the neglect by him to relieve same, together with testimony of experts, supported a finding of failure to exercise ordinary skill and care.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by Herbert Kenneth Priestley, an infant, by guardian ad litem, against A. M. Stafford. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. R. Freeman, of Corona, for appellant. McFarland & Irving, of Riverside, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained as the result of negligent surgical treatment administered by defendant. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

It appears that on May 2, 1911, the plaintiff Herbert Kenneth Priestly, a minor, suffered a fracture of the radius and ulna of his right arm; that defendant, a physician and surgeon, was for compensation employed by plaintiff's father to set, care for, and treat the fractured arm of said minor. The court found:

"That pursuant to said undertaking said defendant, within one hour after the injury had occurred, examined the said broken arm of plaintiff, reduced the fracture, and applied anterior and posterior wooden splints to said arm and bandaged said splints with a roller bandage; that in the bandaging of said arm, as hereinabove described, the said defendant did not make sufficient allowance for the swelling invariably attendant upon fractured limbs; that within two hours after said splints were applied said arm was subjected to undue pressure by said splints by reason of said swelling; that said defendant negligently, carelessly, and without proper or usual care permitted said splints to remain upon said arm, without adjustment, for a period of 38 hours, although said defendant was notified within three hours after said splints were applied that said minor was suffering extreme physical pain by reason of said pressure; that, as a result of said pressure, the circulation of blood through said arm was impaired, resulting in necrosis of the skin and ulceration of the skin, flesh, and tendons on both sides of said arm immediately beneath the entire length of the splints; that by reason of said negligence and careless and unskillful manner of bandaging said splints upon said arm and permitting them to remain thereon without readjustment for a period of 38 hours, and the necrosis and ulceration caused thereby, the muscles and tendons of said arm have contracted, and said arm has become permanently deformed, and the right hand of said minor is now useless, and said minor will not in the future recover the normal use of said hand. That said defendant, in the treatment of said arm of said minor, did not exercise that degree of skill and care ordinarily exercised by the members of his profession, practicing in the said city of Corona, and similar localities."

The only ground urged for a reversal is appellant's contention that these findings are not supported by the evidence. That the child's hand and arm were badly crippled and deformed is conclusively shown, and the evidence is ample to prove that such condition was due to the manner in which the splints and bandages were applied by defendant in dressing the arm after reducing the fracture, and the fact that as applied they were continued without change for some 38 hours.

[1-4] While in actions of this character the injury and the fact that it resulted from the professional treatment administered must be established, such finding standing alone will not justify a recovery of damages by a plaintiff. On the part of a physician who undertakes the treatment of one suffering from disease or injury, there is no implied contract that such treatment will prove a success, or that ill and serious results may not follow as the direct result of such treatment. While "not a warrantor of cures" (Ewing v. Goode [C. C.] 78 Fed. 442), he nevertheless by implication guarantees that he possesses that reasonable degree of learning and skill possessed by others of his profession, and that he will in the treatment of his patient exercise reasonable and ordinary care and skill in the application of such knowledge to accomplish the purpose for which he is employed. Houghton v. Dickson, 155 Pac. 128; Bonnet v. Foot, 47 Colo. 282, 107 Pac. 252, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 136. And where he possesses such degree of learning and in applying it exercises ordinary care and skill, he is not liable for results that follow. Wurdemann v. Barnes, 92 Wis. 206, 66 N. W. 111; James v. Crockett, 34 New Brunswick, 540.

[5-7] Since the contrary is not made to appear, it must be conceded that defendant possessed the requisite professional skill and learning. The court, however, as stated, found:

"That said defendant, in the treatment of said arm of said minor, did not exercise that degree of skill and care ordinarily exercised by the members of his profession. * * *

There is no conflict of evidence as to the fact that the fracture was properly reduced, nor as to the manner in which the splints and bandages were adjusted and the length of time they were continued as originally applied without change. The evidence, however, strongly tends to prove that defendant, for the purpose of retaining the fractured bones in place, adjusted splints and bandages to the injured arm in a manner so tight that no space was left for the enlargement of the arm due to swelling that ordinarily follows in such cases, by reason of which great and undue pressure was applied to the tissues, causing intense pain and complaint by the child that the splints were too tight, of which fact defendant, within an hour or so after leaving the patient, was informed by the boy's father, who suggested that the splints were too tight, notwithstanding which he neglected to visit the boy until the next morning, some ten or twelve hours thereafter, and took no steps to ascertain whether or not the splints should be removed in order to reduce the pressure and relieve the child from the pain due to such undue pressure, other than advising the boy's father to administer a dose of paregoric.

"Negligence on the part of a physician consists in his doing something which he should not have done, or in omitting to do something which he should have done." McGraw v. Kerr, 23 Colo. App. 169, 128 Pac. 873.

And since it must be conceded upon the evidence that the condition of the boy's hand and arm was due to undue pressure caused by the fact that the splints were adjusted in a manner which did not allow for the usual swelling accompanying such cases, the question as to whether such omission constituted negligence was one for expert testimony. When defendant was informed that the child was suffering intense pain and asked if he did not think the splints were too tight, he stated that if the splints were removed he would prefer to do it himself, and said he did not think it would be necessary to do that, as he wanted the splints tight. Dr. Stafford did not make any other suggestion, nor advise that he be called again; nor did he visit the patient until the following morning, at which time the child's fingers were curled over the end of the splints, swollen and discolored, indicating, according to expert witnesses called, that the splints were too tight, as a result of which great pressure was exerted upon the tissues of the arm. No change, however, was made in the splints or bandages. Among other physicians called to testify as to the treatment administered by defendant, was Dr. Martin, who testified as follows:

"From my understanding of the practice of medicine and surgery in this vicinity, and at Corona, I consider that a physician upon being notified of extreme pain existing in a child whose arm had been fractured, and that the child complained that the splints as applied were too tight, should, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, have either called upon the child and determined the cause of the pain, or have ordered the splints loosened. I do not recall any other cause which would cause extreme pain in a fractured limb within one hour after the splints had been applied other than tight splints. * * * The injury to the muscles would be produced by the tightness with which the splints were applied."

And Dr. Griffith testified that, upon being informed within an hour or two of the fact that the child was suffering extreme pain, "my own practice is to loosen the splints, or, if I cannot get to the patient, to tell them to loosen them themselves"; and, further, that the pain suffered by the child indicated that the splints were too tight. He further testified that the swollen and discolored condition of the fingers, as found the next morning, indicated that the splints as applied by Dr. Stafford upon the arm of the child were too tightly applied.

There was other testimony of physicians, all of which clearly tended to prove that defendant was not only negligent by reason of the fact that he applied the splints and bandages in a manner which made no allowance for the swelling of the arm accompanying such fractures, but that he was likewise negligent when, upon being informed within an hour after leaving the child that he was suffering excruciating pain and complaining that the splints were too tight, in not removing the splints himself or having them removed; and likewise negligent, when he visited the child the following morning and discovered the condition of the hand and arm, in not removing the splints in order to relieve the undue pressure which was then apparent. These facts, as well as others which the evidence clearly tended to establish, fully support the finding of the court that defendant, in treating the fractured arm of plaintiff, did not exercise that degree of skill and care ordinarily exercised by the members of his profession practicing in Corona and similar localities.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Adolphus E. Graupner, Judge.

Action by Anna Postler against the Travelers' Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Coogan & O'Connor, of San Francisco, for appellant. F. J. Castelhun, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff, wife of Gustave Postler, was the beneficiary named in two policies of accident insurance issued by the defendant to said Postler. By each of the policies Postler was insured in the principal sum of $1,000 "against bodily injuries effected directly and independently of all other causes through external, violent, and accidental means (suicide, whether sane or insane, is not covered)." The complaint alleged that on the 27th day of January, 1911, said Gustave Postler "received a bodily injury through external, violent, and accidental means * * * to wit, by the discharge of a revolver in the hands of one Ed. Kripp, which said injuries caused the immediate death of said Gustave Postler." These allegations are denied by the answer, which also set up as a separate defense that Postler committed suicide. The case was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the full amount claimed on both policies. The defendant appeals from the judgment entered upon this verdict, and from an order thereafter made denying its motion for a new trial.

There was some conflict in the evidence, but the facts which we are about to state appear in the testimony without substantial dispute. Postler was a painter, living with his wife and son in San Francisco. He had visited the Saratoga Club, a gambling resort located on Mason street in the said city, and had apparently lost money in gambling there. On January 27, 1911, Postler left his home accompanied by his son, a boy of about 16 years. They were riding in a buggy. After going to various places, among others a hardware store, where Postler bought a revolver and some cartridges, he, with the boy, drove to the location of the Saratoga Club on Mason street, arriving there about noon. During the morning Postler had told his son that he was going to get back the money he had lost. Leaving the boy in the buggy, Postler went up in the elevator to the rooms of the Saratoga Club. There he found four or five men, among whom was one in charge of the place. After a few minutes, he drew his revolver and ordered the men present to hold up their hands. Two or three of them, including Kripp, ran out of the room, and Kripp found his way to the sidewalk, where he encountered a police sergeant, from whom he obtained a pistol. Learning from Postler's son that the man upstairs was the boy's father, Kripp asked the boy to go up with him to induce the father to leave peaceably. Kripp and young Postler then went up in the elevator. In the meanwhile, Postler had demanded of the men whom he was holding under cover of his revolver the sum of $1,000, saying that he had come up there to get the money, and if he did not get it he was going to kill somebody and kill himself. Goodrich, the man in charge, told him he could have the money and produced it. He counted out $1,000, which he placed on a table. Postler took the money and put most of it in his pocket, some part of it dropping to the floor in the process. At this stage of the affair, Kripp and the boy appeared. The boy urged his father to give up the money, but the father put him aside. Postler then observed Kripp standing at the door of the room and ordered him to come in. Kripp turned and ran, followed by Postler. The two were thus brought into a room adjoining the one in which the boy and the other men stood. There was an exchange of shots between Kripp and Postler, and Postler fell, mortally wounded. The evidence does not make it clear whether Postler or Kripp fired the first shot.

[1, 2] There was some evidence which, so the defendant claimed, tended to show that Postler had himself fired the shot which ended his life. On the issue of suicide the burden of proof rested upon the defendant (Dennis v. Union Mutual Life Ins. Co., 84 Cal. 570, 24 Pac. 120), and it cannot be questioned that the jury was fully justified in finding that this burden had not been sustained.

[3, 4] But the defendant relied, in addition, upon its denial that the injuries which caused Postler's death had been effected through accidental means. On this issue the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff. "The plaintiff was bound to establish as a part of her case that death resulted from accident. It was not incumbent upon the defendant to negative accident. * * * In order to recover, the plaintiff was bound to allege and prove an injury of a kind covered by the contract, i. e., one effected through external, violent, and accidental means." Price v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 169 Cal. 800, 802, 147 Pac. 1175; Jenkin v. Pacific Mutual L. Ins. Co., 131 Cal. 121, 63 Pac. 180; Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 156 Pac. 1029. The appellant contends, and we think upon good ground, that under any reasonable view of the evidence, the injuries suffered by Postler were not produced by accidental means, but were the natural and probable consequence of his own voluntary acts. In Western Commercial Travlers' Ass'n v. Smith, 85 Fed. 401, 405, 29 C. C. A. 223, 227 (40 L. R. A. 653), the court said that:

"An effect which is the natural and probable consequence of an act or course of action is not an accident, nor is it produced by accidental means. It is either the result of actual design, or it falls under the maxim that every man must be held to intend the natural and probable consequence of his deeds."

See, also, 4 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, p. 356; Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Stacey's Executors, 143 Fed. 271, 74 C. C. A. 409, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 657, 6 Ann. Cas. 955; Price v. Occidental Ins. Co., supra; Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co., supra; Hutton v. State Accident Co., 267 Ill. 267; Prudential Casualty Co. v. Curry, 10 Ala. App. 642, 65 South. 852. In Price v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., supra, we had occasion to deal with a situation somewhat similar to the one before us. The insured had been killed by the discharge of a revolver held in the hands of another person. It was held that "if it should appear that the killing had been the result of an encounter with deadly weapons, and that the deceased had himself invited and brought on such conflict, the fatal result would not have been accidental so far as he was concerned." The decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in Taliaferro v. Travelers' Protective Ass'n of America, 80 Fed. 368, 25 C. C. A. 494, was cited with approval. There the court upheld a directed verdict in favor of the insurance company, it appearing that the insured had invited another to a deadly encounter, which had resulted in his killing. Under the undisputed facts, we do not see how the case at bar can be taken out of the principle of those just referred to. Postler, after arming himself and declaring his intention of getting back his money, had gone to the gambling house and had there undertaken to compel the payment of $1,000 at the point of a pistol. While he was engaged in this effort, an encounter took place between him and one of the men who was in the place when he arrived. In the course of this encounter he was killed.

A man who attempts to obtain money from others by the display of a deadly weapon, aiding such display by threats of killing, must contemplate, as the natural and probable consequence of his actions, that there will be resistance to or interference with the consummation of his plan, and that such resistance or interference will be likely to result in armed conflict and serious injury to one or more of the participants. To all intents and purposes, Postler's position, so far as concerns the probable consequences of his acts, was that of any man who attempts robbery at the point of a firearm. If such a man were killed by his intended victim, it could hardly be claimed that his death was caused by "accidental means," in the sense in which those words are used in policies like the ones before us. We are not suggesting that, from an ethical standpoint, Postler's action was to be judged by the standards which would be applied to the commission of an ordinary robbery. The conditions under which he had lost his money in gambling may have been such as to make him feel, whether rightly or wrongly, that he was justified in resorting to extreme and lawless measures in the effort to recoup his losses. But these considerations do not effect the ultimate question, which is whether the killing was the natural and probable consequence of his own voluntary acts. Under the authorities above cited, this question must be answered in the affirmative. See, also, Hutton v. State Acc. Co., supra; Prud. Cas. Co. v. Curry, supra.

In reaching the conclusion just indicated, it is immaterial whether the first shot was fired by Postler or by Kripp. Conceding that there is evidence to show that Kripp fired the first shot, it still remains that such shooting was the consequence naturally to be anticipated by a man taking the course which Postler took. The respondent makes the suggestion that the verdict may be upheld on the theory that Postler came to his death through a shot accidentally fired from his own revolver. There is, however, no evidence which would warrant the inference that such was the fact. Every probability is against it, and, besides, plaintiff alleges in her complaint that Postler's death was the result of a gunshot wound inflicted by the discharge of a revolver in the hands of Kripp.

[5-7] Some of the instructions to the jury were inaccurate, but since the case must be remanded for the reasons already stated, these matters need but brief mention. Instruction 4, stating the rule for interpreting exceptions in a policy of insurance, should not have been given to the jury. It stated the rule correctly, but the construction of the contract was a matter of law for the court, and the jury could not have been aided by this instruction in deciding the questions of fact submitted to them. Instruction 9 was misleading. We shall not here quote the instruction, but content ourselves with repeating that upon the issue whether the death was effected by accidental means the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, and she was not entitled to recover unless she satisfled the jury by a preponderance of evidence that the injuries had been so inflicted. On the issue of suicide, on the other hand, the burden of proof was on the defendant and before it could prevail on this ground it was bound to establish by the evidence that Postler's death had been caused by suicide. It is true that where a violent death has occurred the presumption, in the absence of further evidence, is in favor of accidental death and against suicide. Jenkin v. Pac. Mut. L. Ins. Co., 131 Cal. 121, 63 Pac. 180. This presumption is, however, merely an item in the evidence, and does not impair the force of the rule that on the whole evidence, including the presumptions, the plaintiff must show as a part of her case the fact that injuries were effected by accidental means.

[8] In instruction 9 the court told the jury that the defense set up by the defendant was an affirmative defense to be established by the defendant by a preponderance of testimony. The instruction should have been limited to the defense of suicide. Stated in general terms, it might have been understood to apply to the defense that the injury was not received through accidental means. As so applied, it did not state the true rule of law.

There were other instructions which correctly stated the rule with reference to the burden of proof on the various issues. Upon another trial, if the case is to be retried, there should be no difficulty in modifying or eliminating the instructions which we have criticized, so that there may be no conflict in the charge taken as a whole.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

CHEDA v. BODKIN et al. (two cases.)
(S. F. 6969, 7075.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1916.
Rehearing Denied July 31, 1916.)

1. PLEADING $\S$ 8(11)—CONCLUSIONS OF FACT—OWNERSHIP.

The pleading of the ultimate fact of ownership is sufficient, except where the pleader avers probative facts which do not support such conclusion, in which case the allegation of ownership is a mere conclusion of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 8(11).]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES $\S$ 158½(1)—TRANSFER OF EASEMENT—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Civ. Code, § 1104, providing that transfer of real property passes all easements thereto, the allegation of a complaint in an action for damages for the interference with a water right that the flow of water from defendants' ranch to plaintiff's ranch was necessary for the full enjoyment, use, and benefit of the latter was sufficient, where the action was founded, not upon a right of way of necessity, but upon an open and notorious use of water appurtenant to plaintiff's ranch and a burden on defendants' ranch.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 189; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 158½(1).]

3. EASEMENTS $\S$ 16—TRANSFER OF EASEMENTS—IMPLIED TRANSFER.

Where the owner of one heritage consisting of several parts has so adapted them that one derives a benefit from the other, and transfers one of them without mention of the incidental burdens of one in respect to others, an implied understanding arises that the burdens and correlative advantages shall continue as before the separation of the title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 43; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 16.]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES $\S$ 158½(1)—EASEMENTS—OWNERSHIP—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Under the general allegation and traverse thereof that plaintiff owned an easement to take water from defendants' ranch, evidence regarding the use of such water at a time when the two ranches were under one ownership was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 189; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 158½(1).]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 1170(5)—REVERSAL—NATURE OF ERROR—STATUTE—VARIANCE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 469, providing that no variance between the pleading and proof shall be deemed material unless actually misleading to adverse party, reopening of case to permit plaintiff to show use of water right at a time when the two estates were under the ownership of one grantor in a common chain of title was not prejudicial, where the right to the water was the issue tried, and where the court stated the purpose in reopening the case, even though such proof was not technically within the allegations of the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4066, 4542; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 1170(5).]

6. WILLS $\S$ 562—EASEMENTS—"TRANSFER"—DEVISE BY WILL.

Under Civ. Code, § 1311, providing that a devise by will conveys all the estate of the deviser therein unless a clear intent to the contrary appears, and Civ. Code, § 1104, providing that the transfer of real property passes all easements appurtenant thereto, a quasi easement for the use of water appertaining to portions of an estate as against a servient estate passes with the premises under a distribution according to the terms of testator's will, the word "transfer" including a devise by will as well as conveyances inter vivos, notwithstanding the definition in Civ. Code, § 1039, that a "transfer" is a conveyance from one living person to another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1225; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 562.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Transfer.]

7. WILLS $\S$ 562—EASEMENTS—IMPLIED EASEMENTS—TRANSFER.

The doctrine of implied easements is not limited to cases of direct conveyances by deed of the common owner, but applies equally to property devised by will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1225; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 562.]

8. EASEMENTS $\S$ 15—OWNERSHIP—TRANSFER—INTENT.

The intention of the grantor in view of all the attendant circumstances is the cardinal subject for inquiry in determining whether an easement passed by the transfer of a portion of the grantor's estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-58; Dec. Dig. ¶15.]

9. ESTATES ¶10(1)—MERGER OF ESTATES—ESSENTIALS.

Unity of estates in all respects is essential to a merger of tenements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estates, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. ¶10(1).]

10. EASEMENTS ¶27—MERGER—EXTINGUISHMENT OF EASEMENTS—UNITY OF TITLES.

In order that unity of title to two estates should extinguish an existing easement, the ownership of the two estates should be coextensive, equal in validity, quality, and other characteristics.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. ¶27.]

11. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS ¶95(1)—RUNNING OF STATUTE—LANDLORD AND TENANT—ATTORNEY BY TENANT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 318, providing that seisin or possession within five years must be shown in action for recovery of real property or possession thereof, and Civ. Code, § 1948, providing that attornment of a tenant to a stranger without the landlord's consent is void, plaintiff's right of action for interference with his easement to a water right was not affected by the statute of limitations during the time that such water right was cut off without his knowledge by the interference of defendant and the payment by plaintiff's tenant of rent for the use of water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 473; Dec. Dig. ¶95(1).]

12. JUDGMENT ¶253(1)—RECOVERY—COMPUTATION—TIME OF TRIAL—ALLEGATIONS OF COMPLAINT.

Where complaint for damages for interference with plaintiff's water right alleged a depreciation in the rental value to the time of the complaint amounting to $1,500, and the prayer was for a much larger sum by way of damages and for general relief as well, the court was not precluded from awarding damages for depreciation in rental value to the day of the trial in excess of $1,500.

13. DAMAGES ¶174(3)—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY.

In an action for damages for the interference with plaintiff's easement to a water right, evidence that plaintiff was compelled to reduce the rent of his ranch because his tenant would not accept the ranch without water supply was evidence of a change in rental value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 464, 467; Dec. Dig. ¶174(3).]

14. DAMAGES ¶188(1)—INTERFERENCE WITH EASEMENTS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a judgment for depreciation in the rental value of land due to the interference by defendants in the use of plaintiff's water right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 511; Dec. Dig. ¶188(1).]

15. DAMAGES ¶109—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—TWO MEASURES OF DAMAGES IDENTICAL.

Under Civ. Code, § 3334, providing that, except as otherwise provided, the measure of damages for the wrongful occupation of real property shall be the value of the use thereof, the act of the court in allowing the depreciation in rental value due to the interference in the use of water right instead of the value of such water right was not error, the two measures of damages being identical, since the diminution of water was the reason for depreciation of the rental.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 273-278; Dec. Dig. ¶109.]

16. DAMAGES ¶163(4)—INTERFERENCE WITH EASEMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN AWARD.

In an action for damages for interference with plaintiff's easement to a water right, the award of damages will not be disturbed because it appears that subsequently to the time plaintiff's easement vested, defendants changed the pipe connections joining plaintiff's pipe to a larger main pipe, where there is no evidence that the new arrangement added to the volume of water available for plaintiff's ranch.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 459; Dec. Dig. ¶163(4).]

17. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ¶158½(1)—REMEDY FOR OBSTRUCTION—JUDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

A judgment for plaintiff in an action for the obstruction of a water right easement which defines the respective rights of the parties as accurately as the circumstances will permit will not be set aside as indefinite and uncertain because plaintiff's volume of water depended upon the seasons and upon the necessary use of others whose right to the use of water was prior to that of plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 189; Dec. Dig. ¶158½(1).]

18. EVIDENCE ¶419(9)—ORAL EVIDENCE VARYING TERMS OF WRITTEN INSTRUMENT.

The oral evidence of a tenant as to what, if any, consideration in addition to that recited in his lease to a subtenant was furnished by him to such subtenant was inadmissible as tending to vary the terms of a written instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1920; Dec. Dig. ¶419(9).]

19. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶205—OBJECTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—NEW OBJECTION ON APPEAL.

The exclusion of testimony of a tenant as to what consideration was furnished by him in subletting to a subtenant on the ground that such testimony tended to vary the terms of a written instrument is not error where the purpose of the testimony to show the true rental value of the property is urged for the first time on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1281, 1282; Dec. Dig. ¶205.]

20. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1056(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF IMMATERIAL EVIDENCE.

The exclusion of testimony which, if admitted, would not materially affect the issues of the case is not prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4187, 4191, 4207; Dec. Dig. ¶1056(1).]

21. DAMAGES ¶44—OBSTRUCTION OF EASEMENT—EXPENSE OF PLAINTIFF.

The expenditure by plaintiff in searching and developing water on his ranch made necessary by defendants' interference with his easement to a water right was not a proper element of damage, where no showing was made that the improvements varied the difference in the value of the land with and without water, or the difference in the rental value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 90, 91; Dec. Dig. ¶44.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge. Suit for injunction by Silvio H. Cheda against Julia C. Bodkin, T. P. Bodkin, her husband, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendants not named appeal, and plaintiff brings a cross-appeal. Affirmed.

Martinelli & Greer, of San Rafael, for appellants. Edward C. Harrison, Maurice E. Harrison, and William B. Kollmyer, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued for an injunction to prevent defendants from interfering with the asserted easement to have a certain supply of water flow from the lands of defendants to and upon plaintiff's property and for damages for the cutting of water pipes by defendant Julia C. Bodkin. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiff. From said judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, certain of the defendants appeal, and the plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the amount of damages awarded, appeals from that part of the judgment.

The litigation grew out of a controversy over the right to the use of part of the water flowing from certain springs on a tract of land in Marin county known as the Molinari ranch. Plaintiff owns an adjoining place called the Frank Foster ranch, and claims the right to use the demanded water for domestic and other purposes thereon. Maria L. Velasco in her lifetime owned both ranches and much other real property in the same immediate neighborhood. The Molinari ranch is on the highest ground. Below it on the same watershed are the dairy ranch, and the home ranch, so-called, and adjoining the Molinari ranch, but on a different watershed, is the Frank Foster ranch. Mrs. Velasco built dams to impound the waters of certain springs, and laid pipes to convey water from the dams to the Molinari ranch house, to the dairy ranch, and to the buildings on the home ranch. She permitted Meyer, a tenant of the Frank Foster ranch, to lay a pipe from the buildings on the Molinari ranch to the Foster ranch. The topography and the location of the pipes was such that the Foster ranch received water only when the other users had closed their pipes so that sufficient water would back up in the main pipe and so flow over to the property occupied by Meyer, and later by his successors. Foster was a tenant of the property that is now known by his name at the time of Mrs. Velasco's death, and was using the water for household and other purposes. By Mrs. Velasco's will the Frank Foster ranch was devised to her granddaughter, Frances O. Pacheco, and the rest of her property was devised and in the probate proceedings was duly distributed to four sons and daughters as tenants in common. Subsequently, in a partition suit to which Frances O. Pacheco was not a party, this land was so divided that Juan Pacheco, the father of Frances O. Pacheco and the husband of Julia C. Pacheco (afterwards Julia

C. Bodkin), took the Molinari ranch, and Catalina C. Valencia took the dairy and home ranches. Gumesindo Pacheco and A. F. Pacheco took other properties. The decree in partition declared the springs on the Molinari ranch to be the property of the four parties in common, each owning an undivided one-fourth interest. A. F. Pacheco never used any of the water, but Gumesindo Pacheco built a pipe line from the main pipe on the Molinari ranch to his property. The use of the water from that time and for many years prior to 1906 may be best described in the words of the opinion filed by the learned judge of the superior court who presided at the trial of the case:

"The home ranch, belonging to Mrs. Valencia, being at the lowest level, always received water. The dairy ranch, the Molinari ranch, and the Pacheco ranch at successive heights above the home ranch received water when the same was not entirely used by those living at the home ranch. The Frank Foster ranch, being at the highest level of all, received water only at such times as the same was not being used by any of the others."

After the death of Juan Pacheco the Molinari ranch was distributed, in 1901, one half to his widow (afterwards Julia C. Bodkin), and the other half to his daughter, Frances O. Pacheco, and in 1903 Mrs. Bodkin conveyed all of her interest in the ranch to her daughter, said Frances O. Pacheco, who from that time until early in 1905 owned both the Molinari and the Frank Foster ranches. She then sold the Molinari ranch to Mrs. Julia C. Bodkin, her mother, who has owned it ever since. Early in 1906 Frances O. Pacheco (who had become Frances O. Laydon) sold the Foster place to Mr. Tognazini, who was acting for himself, the plaintiff herein, and others, and thereafter Mr. Cheda acquired title to the entire Frank Foster ranch. During the ownership of Frances O. Pacheco-Laydon the water was used on the Frank Foster ranch as it had been for many years theretofore. When Mrs. Laydon conveyed the property to Mr. Tognazini the place was leased to Frank Tanforan, her mother's brother. The term of the lease continued until September 26, 1909. A sublessee, Avilla by name, used the property as a dairy ranch. Early in April, 1906, Mrs. Bodkin, who had desired to purchase the Foster ranch, and was very angry when it was sold to other persons, wrote to her brother, Mr. Tanforan, the tenant, informing him that the privilege of taking water from the Molinari ranch would be withdrawn on April 15th. This letter was exhibited to Mr. Tognazini, who at once consulted with Mr. Cheda. True to her threat, Mrs. Bodkin, on April 15, 1906, in the presence of her husband and her brother, caused the pipe leading to the Foster place to be disconnected, and it so remained for two or three weeks. During that time, however, Avilla, the subtenant, acting under the permission of Tanforan, connected the pipe on two or three occasions long enough to fill his tank. For further narrative of the facts we again quote from the opinion of the learned judge of the superior court:

"On or about the 28th day of April, 1906, Mrs. Bodkin and Tanforan entered into an agreement whereby Mrs. Bodkin agreed to permit Tanforan to use the water on the ranch during such time as he might remain as tenant for the sum of $20 per month rental. In September, 1909, Tanforan's lease expired, and on the 26th of that month, the defendant Julia C. Bodkin finally cut off the water and tore up part of the pipe line to the Frank Foster ranch. Since that time no water has been received by plaintiff.

"Plaintiff testified that some time in 1906 he learned that the flow of the water had been interfered with in some way, but, as at the time he acquired this information the water was then being received at the ranch, he paid no further attention to it. He further testified positively that he had no knowledge that Tanforan was paying Mrs. Bodkin for the use of the water until some time in October, 1909.

"While the witness Tanforan contradicts the plaintiff in this regard and states that at some time after the cutting he informed plaintiff that he was paying for the water, Tanforan nowhere fixed the time when he gave such notice to plaintiff, and it is decidedly improbable, considering that Tanforan never claimed any reimbursement for the payments which he made to Mrs. Bodkin, that such could be the fact. It is further to be noted that Tanforan admits that he was present at the cutting of the pipes as a witness for his sister should there ever be a lawsuit over the water rights. * * *

"In view of this admission, it is inconceivable that Tanforan would have put plaintiff on his guard by notifying him of his agreement with Mrs. Bodkin. The court therefore finds that plaintiff had no actual knowledge that Tanforan was paying for the water until 1909."

[1] Appellants assert that their demurrers should have been sustained because the second amended complaint fails to state a cause of action. It is conceded that a pleading of the ultimate fact of plaintiff's ownership of the water right might have been sufficient, but it is the theory of appellants that he has chosen to aver probative facts which do not support the conclusion which he seeks as to the ultimate fact of ownership. The appellant, in other words, invokes the rule announced in such cases as Kidwell v. Ketler, 146 Cal. 12, 17, 79 Pac. 514, that, where a pleader sets forth his chain of title, and upon that chain pleads ownership, the allegation of ownership becomes a mere conclusion of law.

[2] Undoubtedly that is the general rule. Appellants insist that the allegation that on March 8, 1905, Frances O. Laydon was the owner of both properties which, as plaintiff asserts, occupied the relation of dominant and servient tenements, suffices to negative the existence of any easement, because (so the argument runs) Mrs. Laydon's ownership of both ranches destroyed the servitude, citing sections 805 and 811, Civ. Code, and Dixon v. Schermeier, 110 Cal. 582, 42 Pac. 1091. Further, say appellants, the plaintiff's right, if any he have, must be found in the quasi easement at the time of the grant of Laydon to Bodkin which severed the quasi dominant and quasi servient tenements, and upon the reservation of the easement, not expressed in the deed, but implied from its alleged necessity. The complaint contains an allegation that the flow of water from the Molinari ranch to the Foster ranch was "necessary for the full enjoyment, use, and benefit of said Frank Foster ranch," and appellants cite numerous authorities to the effect that this is not a sufficient pleading of strict necessity. These citations include Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 62, 65, 11 Pac. 879; Corea v. Higuera, 153 Cal. 451, 95 Pac. 882, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018; Cassin v. Cole, 153 Cal. 677, 96 Pac. 277; and Bully Hill Co. v. Bruson, 4 Cal. App. 180, 87 Pac. 237. The cases cited do not support the contention of appellants. The authorities refer to rights of way of necessity, but respondent was not seeking to have the court decide that a right of way of necessity existed. The plaintiff's pleading was to the effect that at the time of the severance of the ownership of the two ranches by the deed of Mrs. Laydon to her mother there was an open and notorious use of the water which was appurtenant to the Foster ranch and a burden upon the Molinari ranch. The complaint is sufficient under the rule expressed by Mr. Justice Henshaw in delivering the opinion of this court in Jersey Farm Co. v. Atlanta Realty Co., 164 Cal. 415, 129 Pac. 594, as follows:

"By section 1104 it declared generally that in the case of a transfer of real property other easements may spring into existence, easements which could not be enumerated for the very reason that they embrace every burden which by virtue of the manner of use has been imposed upon the portion of the estate not granted in favor of the portion granted. It is a direct recognition of the principle long established and fully recognized by this court (Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135; Quinlan v. Noble, 75 Cal. 250, 17 Pac. 69), that principle being that, 'where the owner of two tenements sells one of them, or the owner of the entire estate sells a portion of it, the purchaser takes the tenement or portion sold with all the benefits and with all the burdens that appear at the time of the sale to belong to it as between it and the property which the vendor retains.'"

[3] It is to be remembered that, when the two ranches were in one ownership, the Foster ranch was occupied by a tenant who had the use of the water conducted from the Molinari place. Where the owner of one heritage consisting of several parts has so adapted them that one derives a benefit from the other, when he sells one of them without making mention of the incidental burdens of one in respect to the other, an implied understanding arises that the burdens and correlative advantages shall continue as before the separation of the title. Powers v. Hefferman, 233 Ill. 597, 84 N. E. 661, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 523, 122 Am. St. Rep. 199. The same principle is stated in Denton v. Leddell, 23 N. J. Eq. 64. See, also, the authorities cited in the notes to Rollo v. Nelson, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 315. We are convinced, therefore, that even upon appellant's theory the complaint was sufficient, and the court did not err in overruling the demurrer.

[4, 5] But we do not agree with appellants' view in relation to the plaintiff's allegation of ownership of the easement as being a mere conclusion from a plea of the chain of title. This allegation stood by itself, and was denied by the answer. The case was tried on the theory, not that the easement was reserved by implication when Mrs. Laydon executed the deed of the Molinari ranch to her mother, but upon the theory that plaintiff's easement was created by the devise of Maria L. Velasco. At first the court had excluded evidence regarding the user of the premises during Mrs. Velasco's life. Subsequently the case was reopened, after submission, the court declaring that, since Frances O. Pacheco owned the Molinari ranch with the appurtenant water right, however, in common with others, and owned the whole fee of the Frank Foster ranch with all of its appurtenances, there could have been neither creation nor merger of the elements of an easement; that plaintiff's rights, if any, must have had their inception in the decree of distribution of the estate of Maria L. Velasco. Thereafter evidence was introduced in accordance with this ruling. Such evidence was admissible under the general allegation and traverse of the ultimate fact that plaintiff owned an easement to take water from the Molinari ranch. This was the issue tried, and, even if it be conceded that the creation of the easement was alleged in one way and proven in another, appellants were not misled, because the purpose of the court in reopening the case was very plainly stated. Section 469, Code Civ. Proc. This disposes of the objection that the court erred in neglecting to find upon the averment, denied by the answer, that Mrs. Laydon was the owner of the Molinari ranch prior to March 8, 1905, and that on that day she conveyed title to her mother.

Appellants also contend that the court erred in failing to find upon the issue of necessity for the use of the water on the Foster ranch. The complaint alleged and the answer denied this necessity, and we are referred to testimony tending to establish the fact that the Foster place was successfully operated before the installation of the pipes and after their removal. Respondent's reply, which seems to be a complete one, is that, if the court was correct in overruling the demurrer to the second amended complaint, it must follow that strict necessity for the use of the water is not a material issue.

[6] Appellants insist that, while a transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto (section 1104, Civ. Code), the word "transfer," as used in said section, must be given a technical meaning as applying only to living persons (section 1039, Civ. Code), and that, unless it clearly appeared from the will of Mrs. Velasco that she intended to convey a less estate, the devise in her will must be interpreted as abolishing rather than perpetuating the right of her devisee of the Frank Foster ranch to continue the taking of water from the Molinari ranch. Section 1311, Civ. Code. We are of the opinion, however, that quasi easements which a testator has apportioned to various tracts during his or her lifetime ripen into easements in favor of or burdens upon such parcels of land at their severance under the terms of such testator's will. There is no good reason why a difference should be made between a "transfer" inter vivos and a "devise" of land in the matter of the creation of easements, and we are constrained to hold that the word "transfer," as used in section 1104 of the Civil Code, was employed in the general rather than the technical sense. In Jones v. Sanders, 138 Cal. 405, 71 Pac. 506, the court was considering an easement for a sewer over a certain lot in San Francisco. The lot upon which was the dwelling served by the sewer as well as those traversed by it were originally owned by Mr. Cook. In the course of the opinion the following language was used:

"When Mr. Cook constructed the sewer, being then the owner of all three of the lots, he had a quasi easement on the other two lots for the benefit of the residence lot, on which was the head of the sewer, and when it was severed from the other two by the devise of them to Mrs. Martin she took with the burden imposed upon them by her deviser, and an easement in them for the benefit of the lot upon which was the dwelling house was thereby created, and when the stable lot was sold to Magee, and by him to the plaintiff, both of the Pine street lots had an easement in the Jones street lot now owned by defendant."

[7, 8] Appellants say that this is dictum, because the suit was founded upon an easement expressly described and granted by the deed of one of Mrs. Martin's grantees. Nevertheless it is a correct statement of the law. The general rule is that the doctrine of implied easements is not limited to cases of direct conveyance by deed of the common owner, but applies also to property devised by will to different parties. The intention, in view of all of the circumstances, is the cardinal subject for inquiry. 9 Ruling Case Law, § 24, p. 759. In Gorton-Pew Fisheries Co. v. Tolman, 210 Mass. 402, 97 N. E. 54, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 882, it was held that a right of way used by a testator in his lifetime over property which was devised to his sons passed as an appurtenance to other land which his wife took by will. See, also, Stanford v. Lyon, 37 N. J. Law, 426, 18 Am. Rep. 736; Scott v. Moore, 98 Va. 668, 37 S. E. 342, 81 Am. St. Rep. 549; Estate of Thomas, 147 Cal. 236, 81 Pac. 539; Phillips v. Phillips, 48 Pa. 178, 86 Am. Dec. 577; Stephens v. Boyd, 157 Iowa, 570, 138 N. W. 389.

[9] That there was in reality no merger of the tenements constituting the easement when Mrs. Frances O. Pacheco-Laydon owned both ranches was correctly decided by the lower court. She held her water rights in the Molinari tract in common with others. There was therefore no merger, because, in order that such a result may ensue, there must be a unity of estates in all respects. 14 Cyc. 1189.

[10] In order that unity of title to two estates should extinguish an existing easement, the ownership of the two estates should be coextensive, equal in validity, quality, and all other characteristics. Dority v. Dunning, 78 Me. 381, 387, 6 Atl. 6.

[11] Appellants showed that the pipe leading to the Foster ranch had been cut in 1906, and, inasmuch as some of the parties in interest were not brought into the case until more than five years later, when the second amended complaint was filed, they invoke the provisions of section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure as a bar to the action. But the cutting of the pipe in 1906 only produced a temporary stoppage of the water. The service was thereafter resumed on apparently the same terms as those previously existing. Tanforan's attornment to Mrs. Bodkin was void, because plaintiff had no knowledge thereof. Section 1948, Civ. Code. His possession and use of the water after the re-setting of the pipe during the three years following the first cutting was, as a matter of law, that of the plaintiff. The statute did not begin to run, therefore, until the physical assertion of an adverse right by the cutting of the pipe in 1909. Thompson v. Pioche, 44 Cal. 508, 24 Cyc. 955.

[12] It is contended that the judgment for damages is not sustained by the finding on that subject, and that the finding is supported by neither evidence nor pleading. The original complaint filed in 1910 alleged, as did the second amended complaint, damage in the sum of $1,500 due to depreciation in the rental value of the property. The court found that the rental value of the ranch was $2,100 a year, and that plaintiff sustained damage to June 24, 1912, the date of the trial, in the sum of $2,630. It is contended that the court could not give judgment for a greater amount than the plaintiff prayed for. The answer to this argument is that, while there was a general allegation of depreciation of rental value in the sum of $1,500, this allegation did not cover the period between the filing of the complaint and the judgment. The prayer of the complaint was for a very large sum by way of damages, and there was a further prayer for general relief. Under these circumstances the court was not restricted to the sum of $1,500 as the highest possible award under the pleadings.

Plaintiff testified that on the 26th of September, 1909, the date when the pipe was cut, the Frank Foster ranch was yielding a yearly rental of $2,100. As a result of cutting off the water supply the property yielded no rent during the last three months of 1909 and January, 1910. After that plaintiff was obliged, he said, by reason of his inability to develop adequate water supply, to reduce the rental from $2,100 to $1,300 per annum. The judgment was therefore based upon the total loss of rent for four months, $700, plus $1,930, the loss at $800 per year from February 1, 1910, to the date of the trial, June 24, 1912, or, in round numbers, 29 months, amounting to $1,930.

[13-15] The objection is made that this part of the finding and judgment was based upon plaintiff's testimony alone, and that he did not testify regarding rental values, but merely that he had the place rented for $2,100 when the pipe was cut, that his tenant would not accept the ranch without a water supply, and that he reduced the rent to $1,300 a year. This is surely some evidence of the change in the rental value due to the taking away of the supply of water, particularly as Mr. Cheda had testified that he was well acquainted with the values of properties involved in this litigation, and as a banker had loaned money on some of the land as security. Defendants object to the measure of damages applied by the court, insisting that not the difference in rental value of the land is the criterion, but the value of the use of the water right during the time of its interruption. Section 3334, Civ. Code. It seems clear, however, that the two measures of damages are identical, as the diminution in the amount of available water was the sole reason for the reduction of the rent.

[16] Appellants say that the easement was changed after the death of Mrs. Velasco, and that respondent is not entitled to the increased amount of water due to these changes. It appears that the main pipe was 1½ inches in diameter, and that at the time of Mrs. Velasco's death this was tapped by a ¾-inch pipe through which water flowed to a pipe one inch in diameter leading to the Frank Foster ranch. After Mrs. Velasco's death Juan Pacheco changed conditions so that the one-inch pipe leading to the Foster place was joined to the main or 1½-inch pipe. After Mrs. Velasco's death, but before distribution of her estate, a second reservoir was built on the Molinari ranch, and the funds of the estate were drawn upon to pay for it. This was also connected with the 1½-inch pipe, but, as Gumesindo Pacheco's ranch was added to those taking water from the Molinari ranch, it does not appear that the new arrangement added to the volume of water available to the tenant of the Foster ranch. We cannot say, therefore, that the award to plaintiff should be disturbed because of these physical changes in reservoirs and in piping.

[17] We see no merit in the contention that the judgment must be set aside because it is too indefinite and uncertain. The use which occupants of plaintiff's property had made of the surplus flow depended upon the seasons and upon the depletions caused by the necessities of those who were prior to plaintiff in right to draw from the reservoirs. The judgment defines the respective rights of the parties as accurately as the circumstances will permit.

[18, 19] The court excluded certain testimony of Frank Tanforan. The witness had stated that he leased the Foster place from October 1, 1903, for six years, but sublet for the whole term to Mr. Avilla. He was then asked what, if any, consideration in addition to that recited in the lease was furnished by him to Mr. Avilla, and the court sustained an objection on the ground that the evidence sought would vary by oral statement the terms of a written instrument. This ruling was perfectly proper. It is now asserted that Mr. Tanforan's testimony was offered for the purpose of enlightening the court as to the rental value of the premises, but that purpose appeared neither in the form of the question nor in the argument of counsel at the time. The ruling was based upon the form of the question which was apparently intended to add some oral terms to a written document.

[20] Appellants also complain of the exclusion of certain testimony of Mr. Thomas P. Bodkin relative to a conversation between his wife and plaintiff's brother, held by means of the telephone. Mr. V. J. B. Cheda and Mrs. Bodkin agreed that there had been such a conversation, but he denied, while she asserted, that the water was mentioned. It was sought by counsel for defendants to corroborate her testimony on this point by that of her husband. If this was error, it was not material, because, taking Mrs. Bodkin's statement of her conversation with plaintiff's brother and associate as absolutely true, her mere verbal declaration would have no weight against the eloquent and undenied fact that for three years thereafter the water was supplied to Tanforan's subtenant. The important matter and the question for the court was not whether she verbally declared herself entitled to the water, but whether or not the plaintiff, Silvio H. Cheda, knew of the agreement of Frank Tanforan to pay rent for the water.

[21] We now turn to plaintiff's appeal, which is based upon the contention that, in addition to the award made in his favor, he should have been recompensed for the cost of searching for and developing water on the Foster ranch, $2,268.86, and $725 for operating a pumping plant thereon for 29 months at $25 a month. It is true that plaintiff alleged such elements of damage, and that the averment was denied by the answer, but it does not follow that the court erred in failing to find upon this issue. While there was proof of the expenditures alleged, there was no showing that the improvements varied the difference in the value of the land with and without the water or the difference in the rental value. We do not see how such expenditures made in an effort to procure another water supply are proper elements of damage. Therefore the court's failure to find upon this matter was not an injury of which plaintiff may complain.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed in all respects and as to all the appellants, and the order denying the motion of certain defendants for a new trial must also be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

MARYLAND CASUALTY CO. et al. v.

PILLSBURY et al. (S. F. 7492.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 21, 1916.)

MASTER AND SERVANT — 362 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — EMPLOYE — CASUAL EMPLOYMENT.

The employment of a machinist, summoned to a ranch to do a job of repairing a tractor used for farm work, is "casual and not in the usual course of the occupation" of his employer, and hence excluded from the compensation statute by the direct terms of section 14 thereof; although as an accommodation he may have helped with other farm work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. 362.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Casual.]

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act by Charles H. Snow, employé, against Joseph R. Harris, employer, and the Maryland Casualty Company, insurer. Award of compensation to applicant, and the employer and insurer bring certiorari. Award annulled.

Myrick & Deering and James Walter Scott, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Certiorari directed to the Industrial Accident Commission. The writ was issued as prayed, and the return of the respondent commission reveals the following facts:

In a proceeding before the commission entitled "Charles H. Snow, applicant, vs. Jos. R. Harris, defendant," it was decided that Harris was responsible under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, and an award was given accordingly. Harris was insured by the other petitioner, Maryland Casualty Company, but by the contract that corporation did not agree to indemnify him for liability which might be imposed upon him by virtue of the said compensation act. The Maryland Casualty Company, however, waived this exception and agreed to be responsible for any liability imposed upon Harris by reason of the accident to Snow. Joseph R. Harris was a farmer engaged in conducting the "Kelly ranch," so called, in Napa county. On September 1, 1914, he employed Charles H. Snow to repair a tractor used on the ranch in plowing, pulling wagons, and for other purposes in connection with the farming operations. When Snow was hired it was understood that, if he so desired, he might remain in the employ of Harris after the completion of the repair work on the tractor, to drive that machine during the progress of the farming work; but, before he was injured, he had told his employer that he did not care to remain after he should have finished the repairs to the tractor. Snow worked for Harris from the 1st to the 11th of September making necessary repairs on the tractor. This work was interrupted on a few occasions when he helped in piling hay in the barn and when he operated a gasoline engine used to furnish power for a pump. On September 11th, Snow and an assistant were making of babbit metal a new bearing on an axle. In this process it was necessary to pour the heated molten metal into a box around the axle. After the metal had been poured, and while Snow was examining it, an explosion took place which blew the hot babbit metal into his face and caused him to suffer very serious injuries. Subsequently he applied for and was granted compensation under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1913, p. 279).

After reciting the foregoing facts, the Industrial Accident Commission, in the opinion delivered on giving judgment in favor of the applicant, Snow, said:

"In the judgment of this commission, the labor of a machinist repairing farm machinery upon the farm is no more farm labor than it would have been, if the machine had been taken to the shop of applicant at Napa and had been repaired there.

"This conclusion is not weakened by the fact that, two or three times during the ten days' employment, applicant was called to assist for half an hour or so at each time in stowing away hay in the barn of defendant where some extra help was needed. This was regarded by applicant as an accommodation and not in the line of his employment, and is only such a service as any well-disposed person would be inclined to render upon request."

Petitioners here contend that Snow was either a farm laborer, and therefore not within the provisions and benefits of the compensation act, or a mere casual employé not entitled to the indemnity therein provided.

Section 14 of the compensation statute as it existed at the time of the injury suffered by Snow defined "employé" as used in certain sections of that act and excluded from the definition "any person whose employment is both casual and not in the usual course of the trade, business, profession, or occupation of his employer, and also excluding any employé engaged in farm, dairy, agricultural, viticultural, or horticultural labor, in stock or poultry raising or in household domestic service."

[1] Taking the finding of the commission as correct and conceding that the labor of an expert machinist, under the facts, is no more farm labor than it would have been if the machine had been taken to Snow's shop at Napa and there repaired, we see no escape from the conclusion that the employment was both casual and not in the usual course of the occupation of Harris which concededly is farming. True, there was testimony which tended to show that Snow had been hired to run the tractor, incidentally to keep it in repair, and to perform other duties about the farm; and, if there had been a finding that such were the facts, we might be compelled to hold that Snow came within the definition of a farm laborer. The Accident Commission has held that a woodchopper, engaged in cutting and burning trees in clearing land for farming purposes, is engaged in farm labor. Whitney v. Peterson, 1 Decisions of the Industrial Accident Commission of California, p. 306. It has also been held that, when land has been cleared for agriculture, one who operates a saw to cut the wood on the cleared land into suitable lengths for sale is engaged in farm labor. Miller v. Algar, 2 Industrial Accident Decisions, 584. If Snow had been found to be an employé on the farm who, as part of his duties, was required to repair the tractor, we could not see how he could be adjudged not a farm laborer under those decisions. But the Industrial Accident Commission has determined that he was engaged for the single purpose of repairing the tractor, and there is basis in the evidence for that decision.

Respondents' counsel concedes that the commission may not lay down an arbitrary rule that an employé engaged in work of any sort for a period of more than a given number of days is thereby removed from the class of casuals. But we are reminded by him that the exclusion of an employé from the benefits of the act depends upon two concurring circumstances: (1) The employment must be casual, and (2) outside the usual course of his employer's occupation. Counsel insists that the employment was permanent as being "for an indefinite period which may be severed by either party" (citing Bouvier's Law Dict.), and that it was "in the usual course of the business of Harris." True, he admits that the latter contention "would seem, at first blush, to involve an inconsistency"; but he says that "it was part of Mr. Harris' business to have his tractor put in order for use."

We do not see that the definition of permanent employment given by Bouvier fits the hiring of Snow, who was employed by the day. There was nothing indefinite about it except the time which might be consumed in making the necessary repairs on the tractor; but nevertheless Snow was hired for the definite period reasonably necessary for the fixing of that particular machine. If he had been employed to repair tractors as long as the arrangement proved agreeable to him and to Harris, that might have been a permanent hiring, but he was engaged for one specific piece of work. He was no more a permanent employé than the shoemaker to whom, from time to time, Mr. Harris took his shoes to have them mended. His labor was "casual" in the sense of being "incidental" and "occasional," and that undoubtedly is the definition of the word as used in the statute. The word has been defined by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts as indicating "something which comes without regularity and is occasional and incidental," and that court held that a waiter employed by a caterer to serve at an out-of-town banquet is a casual employé. Gaynor's Case, 217 Mass. 86, 104 N. E. 339, L. R. A. 1916A, 363. In New Jersey, it has been held that employment is not casual—that is, arising through accident or chance—where one is hired to do a particular part of a service recurring somewhat regularly with the fair expectation of its continuance for a reasonable period. That was a case in which the deceased, a stevedore, was frequently called upon to perform work when the "prosecutor" had a ship in port to load or to unload. Sabella v. Brazileiro, 86 N. J. Law, 505, 91 Atl. 1032; Same v. Brazileiro, 87 N. J. Law, 710, 94 Atl. 1103. We are not unmindful of the fact that the New Jersey statute excludes all casual employés, while the New York act uses the disjunctive "or" where the Californian law uses the conjunctive "and." In those states it is not necessary that the casual employment must be in an occupation other than in the usual business of the master in order that the claim of the person hired shall be barred; but nevertheless the definitions of the term "casual" by the courts of ultimate authority in those states are valuable.

If the view that this employment was in the usual course of the occupation of Mr. Harris as a farmer be correct, the distinction sought to be established by the statute has no force whatever, because, following to its logical limit the argument of counsel that "it was part of Mr. Harris' business to have his tractor put in order for use," we would have to say that the man who made his clothing for use on the farm, the cobbler who mended his shoes, the locksmith who, at a shop in town, filed a key for the lock on the smokehouse door, and countless others who rendered services of any sort relating to the conduct of his farm were engaged in his occupation. We do not see how such meaning may be attributed to the words of the statute. It is true that the tractor had been used and was intended for use on the farm. Suppose Mr. Harris should decide before plowing time that it was cheaper to use mules and should sell the tractor, might we then say that the repairer's work was "farming" in any sense of the term? As an illustration, we are told that it is part of a farmer's business to store his crops, that building barns for that purpose is part of his occupation, and that the repairer of the tractor is in the same category as a workman on the barn. There are two differences between the machinist who mends a tractor and the man building a barn on a ranch. In the first place, the barn becomes a part of the farm; the tractor does not. In the second place, the barn generally is useful only for farm purposes; the tractor may be used for many things not connected with a farm. When a tractor is brought to a shop for repairs—and the finding of the commission makes this just that sort of a case—the repairer is in exactly the same relation to the owner of the mechanism whether the machine is to be used on a farm, to haul wagons on the highway, or to drag fieldpieces across the plains of Mexico. He is not a farmer in one case or engaged in the usual course of farming, a freighter in another, and a soldier in the third.

It is clear that the repairer, under the facts found by the commission, was a person whose employment was both casual and not in the usual course of the occupation of his employer. It follows that, under the law in force at the time of the accident described in the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission, he was not entitled to the compensation awarded by said commission.

The award is accordingly annulled.

WESTERN INDEMNITY CO. v. STATE INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION. (L. A. 4423.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1916.)

MASTER AND SERVANT §367 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — EMPLOYÉ OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

An accident insurance company is not liable, under Workmen's Compensation Law (St. 1913, p. 279), for indemnity for injuries suffered by an employé of an independent contractor, injured while superintending the installation of apparatus for its assured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. §367.]

In Bank. Certiorari by the Western Indemnity Company, a corporation, to annul the award of the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California. Award annulled.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Manning, Thompson & Hoover, of Los Angeles, for Santa Clara Oil & Development Co. Geo. M. Harker, of Los Angeles, and S. M. Bernard, of San Dimas, for applicant. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an application to annul under certiorari the award of the respondent given against the Western Indemnity Company, under the following circumstances. The Santa Clara Oil & Development Company, a corporation, entered into a contract with the Oil Pumping & Gasoline Company, a corporation, the latter to install apparatus for the proper pumping of oil, etc., from a well on the property of the first-named corporation. The Oil Pumping & Gasoline Company which, for convenience may be called the Pumping Company, had under its control and proposed to use the invention of George W. Turner. Turner, however, was neither an officer nor stockholder of the company. It appears that he was employed by the Pumping Company to superintend and control the installation of this plant. While so doing he was killed. His widow made application before respondent for indemnification for his death. The Pumping Company which employed him and the Oil Company upon whose land the work was being done by the independent contractor, the Pumping Company, were cited to appear before the Commission. It appeared that the Oil Company had taken out indemnification insurance under the terms and provisions of chapter 176 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913, which insurance was—

"for or on account of bodily injuries including death resulting therefrom accidentally suffered while this policy is in force by any employé of the assured, or a contractor or subcontractor, as provided in section 30 of said chapter, in and during the operation of the trade, business or work described, and at the place designated in item No. 2 of said schedule."

Upon application the insurance company was substituted, the Accident Commission made its award in favor of the widow and against the insurance company, and the latter has sued out this writ of review.

Resolving every other question, for the purposes of this consideration only, in favor of the position of the respondent Accident Commission, one undisputed fact remains that the deceased was in no sense an employé of the Oil Company, but was an employé of the Pumping Company, which Pumping Company in the performance of its contract was unquestionably an independent contractor. Under the recent decision of this court in bank in Carstens v. Industrial Accident Commission, 158 Pac. 218, no such liability as here imposed is imposable at the instance of the Accident Commission against the owner and in favor of one who is exclusively the employé of an independent contractor. It necessarily follows that as the insurer's assured is not liable for the indemnification award ordered by the Commission, the insurance company, petitioner herein, is not itself liable.

Wherefore, without consideration of any other questions involved, the award against petitioner is annulled.

John L. McNab and E. H. Wakeman, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. C. M. Fickert and Louis Ferrari, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Petitioner is held in custody by the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco, having been arrested upon three criminal charges based upon the violations of certain provisions of chapter 615 of the Statutes of California. Stats. of 1915, p. 1163. The charges are: (1) That petitioner offered for sale and had in his possession certain eggs theretofore shipped from the Dominion of Canada into the United States without having stamped or printed upon one end of each egg, in black faced letters not less than one-eighth of an inch in width, the word "Imported"; (2) that he received certain eggs which had been produced in the Dominion of Canada and shipped into the United States, without making a report to the state board of health as provided by statute; and (3) that he sold and offered for sale at his place of business eggs imported from Canada, without displaying at said place a sign inscribed "Imported Eggs Sold Here."

Petitioner contends that the statute which he is accused of violating is unconstitutional and void in that it imposes unreasonable restrictions upon him; that by and through

It the Legislature attempted to violate that part of the Constitution of the United States which commits to Congress the exclusive power to regulate foreign commerce; that it imposes a burden equivalent to a tax upon articles which are the subject of foreign commerce, based solely upon their foreign quality, and unjustly discriminates in favor of the citizens of one state.

Respondent seeks to defend the statute upon the ground that it is a proper police measure intended for the protection of the public from the sale of stale and unwholesome eggs. If that be its purpose the statute was very faultily drawn because it does not tend in any way to accomplish that end. It provided no method of inspection; no protection against the inferior quality of eggs placed on sale; and no requirement that the time of production, the method of shipment or manner of attempted preservation of the eggs should be advertised. It merely enjoins upon the dealer in imported eggs the onerous and expensive duty of advertising elaborately the fact that they were not produced in the United States. Its only result would be not to protect the public from the sale of stale eggs, but to aid the domestic producer by appealing to the prejudices of people against eggs produced in foreign lands.

"Imported" eggs are not necessarily stale or unwholesome eggs, and the advertising of such eggs as coming from some place without the United States tends in no manner to protect the health of the Californian public. It is a matter of common knowledge that eggs may be shipped to any part of California from British Columbia more promptly than from the state of Maine or from Florida, and eggs from northern Mexico could be delivered sooner in San Diego than those produced in Petaluma. There is therefore no protection to the public from the sale of stale or unwholesome eggs afforded by this statute, and it is not defensible as a health measure.

This court, something more than a decade ago, declared unconstitutional an act requiring all fruit shipped or offered for shipment to be labeled with the name of the county and locality where it was grown. It was said in plain terms that the Legislature may not under the guise of police regulations enact laws which do not pertain to the protection of the public health or morals, but which do impose onerous and unnecessary burdens upon business and property. Ex parte Hayden, 147 Cal. 649, 82 Pac. 315, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 184, 109 Am. St. Rep. 183. The statute before us is very burdensome. It requires the importer of eggs to open the original packages and to bear the expense of handling and marking each egg, and by this costly process the purchaser is not assured that the unmarked domestic egg is younger or sounder than the one so carefully labeled.

The statute before us is not at all analogous to the laws requiring packages of merchandise to contain brands correctly indicating net contents. Such laws have been sustained by such authorities as In re Agnew, 89 Neb. 306, 131 N. W. 817, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 836, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 676, and others. None of these cases involved a distinction between goods produced in the United States and those manufactured elsewhere. The only important matter decided in the Agnew Case was that the small retail packages shipped in larger containers from outside the state of Nebraska and placed upon the shelves of the merchant had ceased to be articles of interstate commerce and had passed into the commerce of the state, being subject therefore to local statutes. And even in so-called "pure food" statutes the Legislature may not impose oppressive and unnecessary burdens.

Nor do the so-called oleomargarine statutes furnish analogues for the act before us. In such cases as Commonwealth v. Kelly, 163 Mass. 169, 39 N. E. 776, and People v. Arensberg, 105 N. Y. 123, 11 N. E. 277, 59 Am. Rep. 483, cited by respondent, the courts were dealing with statutes which sought to prohibit the sale of substances colored to simulate in appearance butter made from the fats extracted from the milk of cows. The principle of those cases is that a purchaser of a standard article is entitled to protection from deception which may be practiced by the alteration of the appearance of one article to make it seem like something entirely different. In the opinion in the Arensberg Case this fact is emphasized by reference to the holding in People v. Marx, 99 N. Y. 377, 2 N. E. 29, 52 Am. Rep. 34, that a statute was unconstitutional which sought to prohibit the manufacture, for use as food, of any oleaginous substance not produced from pure unadulterated milk or cream. The only purpose of such statutes as the ones upheld by the courts was to prevent the sale of oleomargarine so colored as to look like butter—in short to guard the public from fraud. Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461-468, 15 Sup. Ct. 154, 39 L. Ed. 223. There is no fundamental, organic difference between eggs produced in Canada and those laid this side of the national boundary line. Therefore the advertising requirements of the Californian statute do not protect the public from that sort of deception which foists upon the unwary purchaser an article essentially different from that which he thinks he is getting.

This statute, if enforced, would invoke against eggs shipped from all other countries the prejudice against those brought here from China and Japan involving of necessity long sea voyages. Proper statutes could doubtless be framed, based upon the age, manner of packing, and method of shipment of eggs brought into this state from afar, and the public might be protected from the danger of purchasing as fresh eggs, those imported under adverse conditions. But this is not such a statute. Its sole criterion of alien origin is no proper finding of inferior quality and therefore its burdensome exactions amount to an unjust attempt to exercise the police power. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to discuss the other matters argued in the briefs, except perhaps we should call attention to the fact that as to the requirement of a report to the state board of health no special claim is made by the state, and it does not appear from anything brought to our attention that the state board of health has any function whatever to perform with regard to such report or has been given power of inspection depending upon it.

The provisions of the act under consideration are for the foregoing reasons declared void, and the petitioner is discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards and W. A. Beasley, Judges.

Quo warranto proceedings by the People of the State of California, on the relation of J. N. Black, against Elton R. Bailey, in which the City of San Jose intervened. Judgment for relator, and the intervener appeals from it and an order denying its motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

H. L. Partridge and Earl Lamb, both of San Jose, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Black and Black & Clark, all of San Jose, for respondent.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. This is an information in the nature of quo warranto against Elton R. Bailey to have it determined that the said Bailey has unlawfully intruded into and is unlawfully holding the position or office of captain of police of the city of San Jose, and that the relator, J. N.

Black, is such captain of police, and entitled to the possession of said office and to exercise the functions thereof. The city of San Jose, by permission of the court, filed a complaint in intervention. The judgment of the court was in favor of the relator and against the defendant, Bailey, and also against the intervenor. The defendant, Bailey, has not appealed. The intervenor brings this appeal from the judgment, and also from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The general features of the case may be made to appear from the following outline: The relator, J. N. Black, in 1902 was appointed a member of the police force of the city of San Jose, and in 1906 was advanced to the position of captain of police. July 22, 1908, the chief of police of said city filed charges against him with the board of police and fire commissioners (which will hereinafter be referred to as the board) alleging that he had violated certain provisions of the charter of the city, and asked that he be removed from office. Upon the filing of these charges the board made an order purporting to suspend him from office, and at the same time appointed the defendant, Bailey, to his place. Thereafter, on July 22, 1908, the relator began a suit in the superior court of Santa Clara county against said board and the members thereof to obtain a judgment prohibiting said board from trying him upon the charges so preferred against him. Upon the filing of the complaint the court made a temporary order restraining said board from trying the relator upon said charges "until the further order of the court," and directed the defendants to appear on August 7, 1908, to show cause why they should not be absolutely "prohibited from any further proceedings in said matter."

On August 26, 1908, the board passed the following resolution or order:

"That in order to keep within the allowance made for the maintenance of the police department of the city of San Jose, state of California, by the mayor and common council of said city, commencing with September 1, 1908, the members of said police department be a chief of police, two captains of police, one detective, two patrol drivers, and thirteen patrolmen."

At the same meeting D. W. Campbell, who had been one of the captains of police up to that time, was reappointed, and, in place of the relator, the defendant, E. R. Bailey, was appointed captain of police.

The defendant's answer to said complaint of the relator asking for a writ of prohibition was not filed until November 18, 1908, and in it was incorporated the above order, accompanied by the allegation that by reason thereof the relator was "removed and discharged from and as a member of said police force of the city of San Jose."

Upon the trial of said prohibition suit the court entered a judgment permanently prohibiting the board from trying the petitioner (relator herein) upon said charges.

After the appointment of the defendant,

Bailey, as captain of police the relator began mandamus proceedings against the board to collect his salary as captain of police on the theory that he had never been legally removed from such office, and was still entitled to its emoluments. Judgment was rendered in his favor by the trial court, but upon appeal was reversed by the appellate court and petition for hearing by the Supreme Court denied December 23, 1911.

This information in the nature of quo warranto was filed on the 23d day of March, 1912, and after trial a judgment was rendered therein on the 16th day of July, 1913. In and by said judgment it was determined:

"That J. N. Black, since a time prior to July 22, 1908, has been and now is the duly appointed and qualified captain of police of the police department of the city of San Jose, and that he was illegally removed from said office by the orders of the board; * * * that the defendant since the making of said orders has wrongfully and unlawfully intruded into, usurped, and held said office, and still wrongfully and unlawfully intrudes into, usurps, and holds said office."

That plaintiff be reinstated in said office, and the defendant excluded therefrom.

From the judgment last referred to this appeal is prosecuted. Other facts will be more fully stated in the discussion of the points as they are taken up.

[1] 1. Appellant claims that the action is barred by the provisions of the statute of limitations.

In McPhail v. People, 160 Ill. 77, 43 N. E. 382, 52 Am. St. Rep. 306, it is said:

"We do not consider this quo warranto proceeding prosecuted by the state's attorney for the purpose of ousting one charged with wrongfully and without authority of law exercising the office, jurisdiction, and powers of a police magistrate as simply a civil remedy for the protection of private rights only. Police magistrates are public officers that are provided for in the Constitution of the state, and by that instrument the judicial powers of the state are, in part, vested in them. * * * The office of police magistrate is one in which the state and the general public have a deep interest, and the jurisdiction attached to it is uniform with that belonging to the office of justice of the peace. It is a matter of public concern to the people of the state, and against their peace and dignity, that any one should unlawfully, and without authority of right, exercise the jurisdiction, powers, and functions of such office, and also a matter of interest to the state and to the general public that more persons than the law authorizes are acting as police magistrates. In this country the rule is that the Attorney General or state's attorney may file the information in behalf of the people, where the interests of the general public are involved, at any time, and that, in conformity with the maxim, 'Nullum tempus occurrit regi,' lapse of time constitutes no bar to the proceeding." High on Extraordinary Legal Rem. § 621; Commonwealth v. Allen, 128 Mass. 308.

In High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, § 621, it is said:

"In the absence of any statutory period of limitation, it is held in this country that the Attorney General may file the information in behalf of the people at any time, and that lapse of time constitutes no bar to the proceeding."

We are of the opinion that the established rule of law as to the statute of limitations and its bearing upon cases of this character is correctly stated in the quotations above made, and "that the Attorney General may file the information on behalf of the people at any time, and that lapse of time constitutes no bar to the proceeding." The law, in thus permitting the Attorney General, either upon his own information or upon the information of a private party, to file an information at any time against one who has unlawfully intruded into and is holding a public office, does not place the courts or private parties in much danger of having to deal with stale claims. The action can only be brought with the consent and permission of the Attorney General of the state, and, it is to be assumed, he will exercise his discretion to permit the institution of such a suit if by reason of a great lapse of time the claim has become stale, or for any other reason the state has ceased to have a present interest in it. See State v. Pawtuxet Turnpike Co., 8 R. I. 521, 94 Am. Dec. 123; State v. Tillamook, 62 Or. 332, 124 Pac. 637.

[2] 2. The judgment in this case orders that the defendant be removed and excluded from the office, and that the relator be reinstated therein and permitted to perform its duties, and counsel for appellant in his closing brief says:

"We wish to repeat that it is one thing to oust Bailey from office, and quite a different thing to place Black therein. So far as the restoration of Black to office is concerned (leaving out of consideration for the moment the removal of Bailey), this is nothing in the world but an application for a writ of mandate. That the statute would run against this writ is unquestioned."

It was decided, in Black v. Board of Police Commissioners, 17 Cal. App. 310, 314, 119 Pac. 674, 675:

"When there is an actual incumbent of an office, holding his position and exercising its functions under color of right, mandamus will not lie to a state auditor to compel him to audit the claim of another person for the salary of the office. In such case it is sufficient objection to relief by mandamus that a conflict of title is presented which can be determined only by proceedings in quo warranto, and the auditor himself has no power to inquire into the regularity of the commission issued for the office, or to determine the disputed title."

So, if counsel's point is well taken that, so far as the restoration of Black is concerned, this is nothing but an application for a writ of mandate, then he should be defeated regardless of the pleas of the statute of limitations; for it has already been decided that his right to the office cannot be adjudicated in such a proceeding.

The relief granted Black by this judgment is the relief that the Code expressly provided may be granted in quo warranto proceedings, and the court is not prepared to hold that the action is not barred in so far as it is a proceeding to oust Bailey from the office, but that it is barred in so far as it reinstates Black therein. By section 805 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided:

"In every such action judgment may be rendered upon the right of the defendant, and also upon the right of the party so alleged to be entitled, or only upon the right of the defendant, as justice may require."

Until the rights of Bailey to the office had been determined adversely to his claim in quo warranto proceedings, Black could bring no independent action or proceeding looking solely to his restoration to it. And the Legislature very wisely provided that the rights of the one thought to be holding the office unlawfully and of the one claiming to be entitled to it might be adjudicated in one and the same suit. As the only proceeding Black could institute to regain the office was an information in the nature of quo warranto, and as such action is not barred, the part of the judgment reinstating Black in the office is relief properly granted to him.

The cause of action set forth in the information not being barred, the court was not restrained, by any statute of limitations, from granting all the relief that the law expressly declares may be granted in such an action.

[3] 3. The case does not show laches on the part of the state or on the part of the relator barring relief. Laches has been thus defined by our Supreme Court:

"While the words 'laches' and 'acquiescence' are often used as similar in meaning, the distinction in their import is both great and important. Laches import a merely passive, while acquiescence implies active, assent; and, while, when there is no statutory limitation applicable to the case, courts of equity would discourage laches, and refuse relief after great and unexplained delay, yet, when there is such a statutory limitation, they will not anticipate it, as they may when acquiescence has existed. Laches, in fact, amount only to that inferior species of acquiescence described in the following terms by Lord Kindersley, in Rochdale, etc., Co. v. King, 2 Sim. (N. S.) 89: 'Mere acquiescence (if by acquiescence is to be understood only abstaining from legal proceedings) is unimportant; where one party invades the right of another, that other does not in general deprive himself of the right of seeking redress merely because he remains passive, unless, indeed, he continues inactive so long as to bring the case within the purview of the statute of limitations.'" Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 270, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674.

Nothing appears in the conduct of the relator since August, 1908, that savors at all of laches as above defined. No delay is shown in asserting his rights, and the lapse of time between his attempted ouster and the bringing of this proceeding is fully and satisfactorily explained and excused. In addition to the prohibition suit above referred to he began mandamus proceedings to collect his salary. This proceeding was finally decided against him on the ground, distinctly stated, that before a judgment could be rendered in his favor for his salary it would be necessary to determine his right to the office; that this could not be done in a mandamus proceeding while another was occupying the office, performing its duties, and claiming the right so to do. The present action was begun within 90 days after the final disposition of the mandamus proceeding. The record shows that relator has at all times been actively asserting his right to the office, and, while it was finally decided that he had mistaken his remedy, it may not be said that his conduct shows "passive assent" to the conduct of the board or city or defendant and negatives all idea of unexcused delay.

The following finding of the trial court is abundantly supported by the record:

"That the relator has at all times proceeded diligently to have the title to the said office and position of captain of police determined, and that all the foregoing proceedings taken on his part were of great expense to him, and were all taken in good faith under the belief that he was proceeding properly to have the title to said office and position regularly determined and tried"

—and effectually disposes of the claim of laches.

[4, 5] 4. The board in its answer to the suit brought by the relator against it to obtain a writ prohibiting it from trying him upon the charges preferred against him pleaded as a defense that since the commencement of the action it had reduced the number of the police force, and that relator herein "was, because of the reduction in the said police force, removed and discharged from and as a member of said police force of the city of San Jose." Upon the conclusion of the trial of said action findings were waived, and judgment rendered prohibiting the board from at all trying the petitioner on said charges that had been preferred against him. Said judgment contained, in the recitals thereof, the following:

"Since the issuance of said interlocutory writ said board have on the 26th day of August, 1908, passed an order reorganizing the police force of the city of San Jose, and thereby estopping themselves from trying plaintiff on said charges, and on that ground. It is ordered," etc.

As to the effect of this recital and judgment: Counsel for appellant takes the position that it decides that Black was properly and legally removed from the police force by the order of August 26, 1908, and was no longer a member thereof, and that said judgment is a final determination of that question, and estops the parties for investigating it in this action; while counsel for respondent claims:

"The judgment in the prohibition case finally and conclusively determined relator's title to the office of captain of police."

Is either of these positions tenable?

A judgment rendered in another action between the same parties may, when pleaded, be viewed in two aspects: (1) As "a final determination of the rights of the parties in the action or proceeding" (Code Civ. Proc. § 577); and (2) as an adjudication of certain questions that may have been put in issue, tried, and decided. The judgment in this case was a final adjudication that the board had no right to and should not try the relator upon the charges that had been presented against him. We assume that it is pleaded in this action by the appellant for the purpose of showing that in the former action the mixed question of law and fact of whether respondent had been legally removed from the office was put in issue, was tried, and decided against J. N. Black, the respondent in this action; that, having thus once been put in issue in an action between the same parties, the question cannot again be litigated between them.

The law upon this matter is clearly stated in Green v. Thornton, 130 Cal. 482, 62 Pac. 750, wherein (quoting from S. P. R. R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 18, 42 L. Ed. 355), it is said:

"The general principle announced in numerous cases in this court is that the right, question, or fact definitely put in issue and directly determined by the court of competent jurisdiction as a ground of recovery cannot be contested in a subsequent suit between the same parties or their privies."

Section 1911 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"That only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereto."

In Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606, 24 L. Ed. 214, it is said:

"It is undoubtedly settled law that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction upon a question directly involved in one suit is conclusive as to that question in another suit between the same parties. But to this operation of the judgment it must appear either upon the face of the record or be shown by extrinsic evidence that the precise question was raised and determined in the former suit. If there be any uncertainty on this head in the record, as, for example, if it appear that several distinct matters may have been litigated, upon one or more of which the judgment may have passed, without indicating which of them was thus litigated, and upon which the judgment was rendered, the whole subject-matter of the action will be at large, and open to a new contention, unless this uncertainty be removed by extrinsic evidence showing the precise point involved and determined. * * * If upon the face of the record anything is left to conjecture as to what was necessarily involved and decided, there is no estoppel in it when pleaded, and nothing conclusive in it when offered as evidence."

"An estoppel cannot be created by mere argument." Freeman on Judgments, § 258.

With these settled principles of law before us, we proceed to analyze the situation a little more closely.

I. A finding by the court that the board had removed the relator from office was not necessary in order to render the judgment that was rendered.

"It is allowable to reason back from a judgment to the basis on which it stands, upon the obvious principle that, where a conclusion is indisputable and could have been drawn only from certain premises, the premises are equally conclusive and indisputable with the conclusion. But such an inference must be inevitable, or it cannot be drawn." Freeman on Judgments, § 257.

The judgment could well have been rendered on a view taken by the trial judge that the charges were insufficient in substance or in legal effect to justify a trial. It could have founded its judgment on the theory entertained by it that the affidavit filed by petitioner stated grounds for relief and that its allegations had been established by the evidence. Hence an implied finding by the court that the defendant had been removed from office was not necessary to the judgment. If it was, then it follows that the complaint did not state facts entitling plaintiff to relief by way of a judgment of prohibition, because it contained no reference to the order of August 26, 1908. Nor does the recital in the judgment show that the court determined, either expressly or impliedly, that the relator had been removed and was no longer an officer of the municipality. The judgment recites that the board "on August 26, 1908, passed an order reorganizing the police force of the city of San Jose." This is the extent of the recital as to what was done. For the former judgment to be an estoppel upon the question as to whether the relator has been legally removed from his office, the court, in addition to the above recital, should have found that by reason of said reorganization by the board the relator has been discharged from the police force, that the acts of the board legally had that effect, and that he was no longer a member thereof. A mere recital or finding that the police force had been reorganized falls far short of a finding that the relator had been legally dismissed from the police force. In said recital the court also states that by its acts the board had estopped "themselves from trying plaintiff on said charge," and this is claimed as a final adjudication that he was no longer a member of the force.

That the court did not intend by the use of the word "estopped" to find that relator was no longer a member of the force is apparent from the whole situation and from the judgment of prohibition that followed. The words are more in the nature of a reason advanced by the court why relator should have the judgment prayed for and which was awarded to him.

"The effect of a judgment as res adjudicata is not limited or enlarged by the reasons given by the court for its rendition." Davis v. Mil-laudon, 17 La. Ann. 97, 87 Am. Dec. 517.

"With the process of reasoning by which the court reached its conclusion we have nothing to do." In re Kingsley, 93 Cal. 576, 29 Pac. 244.

We conclude that the relator is not estopped by said judgment from prosecuting this action.

[6] 5. Counsel calls attention to section 16 of article 20 of the Constitution, wherein it is provided that, if the term of an officer is not provided for in the Constitution, it may be declared by law, and, if not so declared, he shall hold his position at the pleasure of the appointing power, and argues that, if the charter did not fix the term of a captain of police by stating the definite number of years of such term (and this the charter does not do), then, under the above constitutional provision, he would hold at the pleasure of the board, and it could discharge him at any time, and that the provision in the charter that he could only be removed for cause and after trial is in conflict with said constitutional provision.

The charter of the city of San Jose is not a law passed by the municipality. It is a law of the state having the same force and effect as a law directly enacted by the Legislature, and must be "upheld unless it is clearly shown to have been at the time of its enactment repugnant to and inconsistent with the then existing fundamental law." Stern v. City Council, 25 Cal. App. 685, 145 Pac. 167. When the charter of the city of San Jose became a law, subdivision 3 of section 8½ of article 11 of the Constitution provided that it should be competent in all charters framed under the authority of section 8, art. 11, to provide "for the constitution, regulation, compensation, and government * * * of the municipal police force." This language is broad enough to embrace provisions in a charter fixing the personal qualifications of the members of the police force, the time they may serve, and the manner and conditions of their removal, and, if express authority from the Constitution is needed for the provision in the charter that members of the police force can only be removed for cause and after trial, it is found in the above provision.

[7] 6. The point is made that it does not appear that relator ever had a commission issued to him "as captain of police and never subscribed or took an oath of office as such."

A captain of police is a member of the police force of the city. Section 6, art. 10, of the charter (Stats. 1897, p. 625). At the time of his appointment to the police force of the city he took and subscribed the requisite oath. It was not contemplated that with every change in his position on the force, by promotion or otherwise, he should again take and subscribe an oath as such member of the police force.

[8] 7. The charter of the city of San Jose provides that officers of the police force shall retain their positions during good behavior and efficiency, and shall not be removed except for cause, and provides that in any case for removal for cause there shall be a trial had after notice. Additionally to show that the relator could only be removed after a trial had and an order of removal made, we quote the following from the opinion in Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 205, 116 Pac. 732:

"The doctrine that an officer can be removed only upon notice, and after a hearing, where the tenure of his office is during good behavior, or until removal for cause, or for a definite term, subject to be removed for cause * * * may be regarded as settled law in this country."

It is conceded that the relator was never thus removed.

[9] 8. The order of suspension made upon the filing of the charges against the relator was only temporary in character, and its force and effect ended with the final judgment of the court prohibiting the board from trying him thereon.

[10] 9. As to his removal from office by virtue of the purported order of the board reducing the number of the police force, the court, upon abundant evidence, made the following finding:

"That the aforesaid action of the board and the adoption of the aforesaid orders and resolutions were all wholly in bad faith and solely for the purpose of ousting the relator from his said office and position and depriving him thereof without a hearing or trial of any kind and for the purpose of giving to Elton R. Bailey the office and position of the relator."

That said orders were not a reorganization in any particular, so far as covered captains of police; that it intended all the time that the department should consist of two captains of police with precisely the same duties of office that theretofore existed, and such orders did not change or modify the office of captain of police, but were made for the purpose of evading and avoiding the requirements of the charter, which accorded to relator the right to hold his office until accusations were made against him and regularly tried.

As the findings of the court are supported by the evidence, the judgment by the findings, and as no reversible error appears in the record, it follows that the judgment and order should be, and they are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Portland Cement Company, Consolidated, against A. W. Reincke. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for appellant. Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. On September 24, 1910, the Metropolis Construction Company executed to the plaintiff two promissory notes for $1,307 and $2,000, respectively, upon which the plaintiff secured a judgment against the defendant, as the guarantor and indorser of the notes, in the sum of $3,680.25, which included interest from the date of the notes. It is an admitted fact in the case that the defendant signed both notes on the back thereof at the same time in the dual capacity of guarantor and indorser.

The plaintiff's complaint sets forth four causes of action. It is conceded that the defendant's general demurrer should have been sustained to the second and fourth counts, upon the ground that they did not state a cause of action. It is not disputed, however, that the remaining counts were proof against demurrer, and sufficient as a matter of pleading to support the judgment if the points made for a reversal—the insufficiency of the evidence and errors of law occurring during the trial—be found untenable. We need not therefore concern ourselves with the error of the trial court in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the second and fourth counts.

The existence and sufficiency of the consideration to support the defendant's guaranty and indorsement of the notes was the paramount issue in the case. Incidentally the pleadings presented the issue as to whether or not the guaranty and indorsement were made contemporaneously with or subsequent to the execution of the notes. It was the theory of the defendant's defense to the action that he had made the indorsement and guaranty after the delivery of the notes by the maker to the plaintiff, and that therefore he was but an accommodation indorser; and that in the absence of a consideration independent of the making of the notes he was not liable to the plaintiff, the party alleged to have been accommodated. The notes in suit were made and dated September 24, 1910, and the trial court found that upon the execution of the notes and on the date thereof the defendant "by a writing upon said promissory note waived demand, notice of nonpayment and protest of said promissory note, and guaranteed the payment thereof and indorsed said promissory note, and thereupon said promissory note was delivered to the plaintiff herein, and the plaintiff accepted the same for a valuable consideration"—a similar finding being made for each note.

[1] This finding we think is sufficiently supported by the evidence. The indorsement itself was presumptive evidence of a consideration therefor, and also of the fact that it was made at the time and place of making the note. Civ. Code, §§ 1614, 1615, 3104; Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 21, 22, 39. In addition to this presumptive evidence the record discloses direct evidence adduced upon behalf of the plaintiff to the effect that the defendant's name was signed to the indorsement and guaranty upon each of the notes when they were delivered to the plaintiff.

[2] Conceding that it was shown upon cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness that the latter evidence was either without foundation or rested upon hearsay, nevertheless not having been objected to upon those grounds in the first instance, nor followed by a motion to strike out upon discovery of its defect in either or both particulars, such evidence may be resorted to in support of the findings as made. Morrell v. Morgan, 65 Cal. 575, 4 Pac. 580; Janson v. Brooks, 29 Cal. 214, 223; Curia v. Packard, 29 Cal. 194, 197; Prentice v. Miller, 82 Cal. 570, 572, 23 Pac. 189; Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 97, 102, 77 Pac. 762.

In further support of the trial court's finding the record shows testimony of the defendant himself, given upon cross-examination, which we think tended to show that the party accommodated was the maker of the note, the Metropolis Company, and not the plaintiff. In this behalf the testimony of the defendant was to the effect that at or about the time of the execution of the notes in controversy he had indorsed a number of other notes for the Metropolis Company; that he was a friend of Mr. Emille, who organized the Metropolis Company; that the defendant owned stock in the company; and that he indorsed and guaranteed the notes in con-

[3-5] The preſumptive evidence of the time of the making of the indorſement and guaranty and the conſideration therefor may be reſorted to in aid of the findings, even though it be aſſumed, as counſel for the defendant contends, that it ſtands alone and was oppoſed by direct evidence to the contrary. The general rule that as againſt a proved fact, or a fact admitted, a diſputable preſumption has no weight, is ſubject to the exception that where, as in the preſent caſe, an endeavor is made to eſtabliſh a fact contrary to the preſumption, the fact in diſpute ſtill remains to be determined upon a conſideration of all of the evidence including the preſumption. People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 54 Pac. 833; Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 19, 36, 77 Pac. 712; Moore v. Gould, 151 Cal. 723, 726, 91 Pac. 616. Therefore, giving all the weight and credence contended for by counſel for the defendant to the evidence adduced in ſupport of the defense made, there ſtill remains a ſubſtantial conflict in the evidence which, under the familiar rule, cannot be availed of upon appeal to diſturb the findings of the trial court.

[6] The error, if any, in the ruling of the trial court reſuſing to ſtrike out the answer of a certain wiſſneſ given in reſponſe to a queſtion propounded by the court itſelf, was, we think, rendered harmleſſ upon further cross-examination of the wiſſneſ by counſel for the defendant, which called for and elicited a repetition of the teſtimony now claimed to be immaterial and incompetent.

[7, 8] If the record clearly ſhewed, as counſel for the defendant inſiſts, that the repetition of the teſtimony complained of was elicited by the further queſtioning of the court and not by the further cross-examination of counſel, then of courſe it would not have been incumbent upon him to make a ſecond objection, and his failure to do ſo would not be conſidered as a waiver of the objection previously made. The record, however, does not ſo ſhow. The queſtion complained of appears to have been interjected by the court during the cross-examination, and from the break in the text which appears at the conſequence of the queſtion, the answer and the motion to ſtrike out, it is fairly inferable that the repetition of the teſtimony was provoked by the further cross-examination of counſel for the defendant. In any event the text of the record upon the point in queſtion is ambiguous; and in the face of ſuch ambiguity it cannot be ſaid that the appellant has ſuſtained the burden which he muſt aſſume upon appeal to ſhow prejudicial error in the ruling of the trial court.

[9] The queſtion, "At the time the note was delivered to you were thoſe names written on the back?" propounded to the plaintiff's wiſſneſ, Henderson, was not objectionable upon the grounds that it was leading and called for a conſequence of the wiſſneſ.

The mere fact that the queſtion could be answered by "Yes" or "No" did not make it leading (People v. Jones, 160 Cal. 358, 117 Pac. 176); and obviously the preſence or abſence of the names on the note at the time ſtated called for a fact and not a conſequence; and it is equally obvious that the word "delivered" as employed in the queſtion related to the manual transfer of the note, and did not call for the conſequence of the wiſſneſ as to whether or not there had been a legal delivery.

[10] There was no error in the ruling of the trial court ſuſtaining an objection to a queſtion put to the wiſſneſ Henderson upon cross-examination which called for teſtimony as to whether or not the defendant had indorſed certain notes of the Metropolis Company which had been ſurrendered and canceled upon the execution of the notes in ſuit. Up to the time of the ruling complained of nothing had been developed upon the direct examination of the wiſſneſ which warranted the cross-examination in queſtion. As the trial court ſtated when making its ruling, the teſtimony ſought to be elicited by the queſtion objected to would perhaps have been pertinent if counſel for the defendant had not ſuſceſſfully inſiſted on the ſtriking out of certain teſtimony elicited upon the direct examination of the wiſſneſ to the effect that the credit man of the plaintiff had inſtructions to accept no notes from the Metropolis Company unleſſ indorſed by the defendant coupled with a waiver of proteſt ſigned by him. Not being cross-examination it is not apparent that the teſtimony objected to was otherwiſe relevant or material to the iſſues raised either by the pleadings or the evidence adduced in the caſe up to the time of the ruling.

[11] Decidedly different were the circumſtances attending the ruling of the trial court permitting the defendant to be cross-examined over objection concerning the fact that he was indorſing a great many notes for the Metropolis Company about the time of the execution of the notes and the indorſement and guaranty in ſuit. In this behalf the record ſhows the teſtimony of the defendant upon direct examination in part to be to the effect that he had indorſed and guaranteed the notes in ſuit after their execution and delivery at the requeſt of an unidentified perſon who claimed to be the representative of the plaintiff, and that he ſigned the indorſement and guaranty merely as a matter of accommodation to the plaintiff. It is apparent upon a reading of the entire cross-examination that the queſtion objected to was intended primarily to be preliminary to other queſtions which were deſigned to diſcredit the defendant's recollection of the circumſtances preceeeding and attending the preſentation of the notes in ſuit to him for his indorſement and guaranty. Obviously, therefore, the queſtion complained of was proper cross-examination; and the fact that it may have tended in a measure to support the inference fairly deducible from other evidence in the case that the party accommodated by the indorsement and guaranty was the Metropolis Company and not the plaintiff, did not make it any the less proper cross-examination.

In answer to the suggestion that no foundation was laid for the testimony elicited by the question immediately under consideration, it will suffice to say that if a foundation was necessary the lack of it was not made a ground of the objection. This in effect disposes of all the points made in the case.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Charles Mettler against Warren Vance and another, a copartnership doing business under the firm name and style of the Vance-Canavan Motor Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying their motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Carroll E. King, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

As alleged in the complaint, plaintiff and defendants, on October 4, 1912, entered into a written contract whereby the latter agreed to sell and deliver to plaintiff, within 30 days from said date, an automobile described therein as a Model No. 22, 40 h. p., Marquette Roadster, the agreed price of which, with extra equipment was fixed at $3,223.50, upon which price defendants allowed plaintiff the sum "of $723.50 for advertising," and $700 for a Wescott automobile owned by him and which he then and there transferred and delivered to defendants, and also paid them $100 in cash, all of which sums were by defendants acknowledged as being received and applied upon the purchase price of the Marquette roadster sold and agreed to be by defendants delivered to plaintiff. By the terms of the agreement plaintiff agreed to pay to defendants the balance of the purchase price of said car, namely: $1,700, when the Marquette roadster should be delivered to him. Defendants neglected and refused to deliver the Marquette roadster as agreed, whereupon plaintiff, on November 6th, demanded the return to him within three days of the Wescott car, together with the $100 in cash, transferred and paid on account of said purchase price, which demand was refused. Thereupon plaintiff brought this suit, praying for a rescission of the contract and the return of the Wescott car and the $100 so transferred and paid to defendants.

[1, 2] While inartificially drawn, we are of opinion the complaint, the substance of which is stated, was sufficient as against the general demurrer interposed by defendants. The result of defendants' refusal to deliver the car in accordance with the contract constituted a failure of the consideration upon which plaintiff delivered the Wescott car to them. Subdivision 2, § 1639, Civ. Code. Moreover, a rescission on the part of defendants was implied by their refusal to comply with the contract, in which plaintiff acquiesced, thus effecting a rescission by consent. Cromwell v. Wilkinson, 18 Ind. 365. Hence, the parties stood towards each other as though no contract existed, and defendants being in possession of plaintiff's property to which they had no right or title and refusing to return and redeliver the same, he was entitled to maintain an action therefor.

[3] Appellants devote a large part of their brief to a discussion as to whether or not, as found by the court, time was the essence of the contract, without which they claim it could not be rescinded. According to our view of the complaint, as stated, this question becomes unimportant, for—

"neither at law nor in equity is a contracting party excused from performing his contract within the time agreed upon, further than that in certain contracts failure to perform strictly according to contract, as to time, does not authorize the other party to rescind." American Type, etc., Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 459, 62 Pac. 744.

Strictly speaking, the right of plaintiff to rescind depends not upon the question as to whether or not time was mentioned in the contract as being the essence thereof, but whether defendants' failure to perform the contract was a breach of a substantial part thereof for which damages would be an inadequate compensation. Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 508, 25 Pac. 686. Upon evidence sufficient to justify the same, the court found that time was the essence of the contract. Conceding that before one party can rescind he must place the other in statu quo, such rule has no application here, since plaintiff under the terms of the contract had received nothing whatsoever from defendants.

[4] The nature of the contract was such that damage due to delay in the performance thereof, so far as it affected plaintiff, was not capable of ascertainment (section 1492, Civ. Code), and hence defendants' offer of performance at a later date and after the commencement of this suit, thus disregarding the question of time found by the court to be a substantial part of the contract, imposed no duty upon plaintiff to accept the tardy offer, but left him free to pursue his remedy by rescinding the contract and recovering the property, or the value thereof, which he had transferred to defendants on account of said purchase.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Julia McCarthy against the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, in which Patrick Holland, as Administrator of the estate of Mary Anne Holland, was interpleaded upon his assertion of an adverse claim to the deposit in suit. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant administrator appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

W. E. Cashman, of San Francisco (J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial in an action originally commenced against the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society to recover a sum of money on deposit with that institution, and by which the defendant Patrick Holland, administrator, etc., was interpleaded upon his assertion of an adverse claim to said deposit.

The facts of the case are substantially undisputed and may be summarized as follows: Julia McCarthy, the plaintiff herein, was the niece of Mary Anne Holland, and between them existed strong ties of confidence and affection. On and prior to April 20, 1911, Mary Anne Holland was the owner as her separate property of a sum of money in excess of $6,000, which was on deposit with the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society. On said last-named day Julia McCarthy was at the home of Mary Anne Holland, who was quite ill and who, in fact, had but a short time to live, when the latter caused a notary public to be called for, and upon his arrival and in his presence executed and delivered to the plaintiff the following writing:

"San Francisco, Cal., Apr. 14, 1911.

"The Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, San Francisco, Cal. Gentlemen: Please transfer the balance due on my account No. 193-352 to an account in the names of Mary Anne Holland or Julia McCarthy, payable to either or to the survivor.

"Witness: Scully."

At the time of the delivery of this document to the plaintiff, Mary Anne Holland stated to her and to those present that she wanted Mrs. McCarthy to have the money which was on deposit with the Hibernia Bank, expressing at the same time her affection and regard for her; and she also and on that day handed to her the passbook showing the fact and the amount of the deposit. On the following day the plaintiff presented to the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society the above document, together with the passbook of Mary Anne Holland, and thereupon the bank closed the individual account of Mary Anne Holland and opened a new account in which the sum on deposit, formerly to the credit of Mary Anne Holland was made payable to "Julia McCarthy or Mary A. Holland, to either or to the survivor of them." The bank also issued and delivered to the plaintiff a new passbook showing such deposit, which the plaintiff carried back to Mrs. Holland, who directed her to keep it. On the same day the plaintiff drew from said account the sum of $500, which she applied to her own uses with the knowledge and full concurrence of Mrs. Holland. On the 7th of May, 1911, Mary Anne Holland died, and thereafter Patrick Holland was appointed administrator of her estate, and as such administrator made demand upon the Hibernia Bank for the amount of said deposit. This demand caused the bank to withhold the money from both claimants until this suit was brought, when it relieved itself from liability by its interpleader of the parties. Patrick Holland, as administrator of the estate of Mary Anne Holland, deceased, having been thus substituted as party defendant, filed an answer and cross-complaint, setting up title to the deposit in question. Upon the issues thus joined plaintiff recovered judgment, and from it and the order denying the motion for a new trial this appeal has been taken.

The appellant devotes the larger portion of his brief to the contention that the evidence does not sustain the finding of the court that it was the intention of Mary Anne Holland, on the date of the instrument in question, to transfer to Julia McCarthy the money in the Hibernia Bank at the time and by means of the execution and delivery of the said instrument; but in this we think the appellant is in error, and that there is ample evidence that such was her intention, and that the relation of the parties was such as to make it desirable and proper that such intention should be given effect if a fair construction of the instrument in question will produce that result.

[1] The appellant, however, insists that the writing cannot be given such construction, for the reason that it shows upon its face, and as construed in the light of the subsequent conduct of the parties to it, that Mary Anne Holland did not surrender dominion and control over the fund in question to such an extent as to satisfy the requirements either of a valid gift inter vivos or of a trust in said fund for plaintiff's benefit, citing numerous cases in support of such contention. We are of the opinion, however, that the case of Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370, as recently adopted and applied by this court in the case of Drinkhouse v. German Sav. & Loan Society, 17 Cal. App. 162, 118 Pac. 953, has direct application to the case at bar, and that the instant case presents an even stronger claim for the application of the principles therein enunciated than either of the foregoing cases, and brings this case practically within the reasoning and conclusions of Chief Justice Beatty in the case of Sprague v. Walton, 145 Cal. 228-233, 78 Pac. 645. The plaintiff herein was put in a position which enabled her to withdraw from the Hibernia Bank the entire amount of this deposit if she so desired during the lifetime of Mary Anne Holland; and that it was the undoubted intention of said Mary Anne Holland that the plaintiff should have such absolute control over these funds is evidenced, not only by her acts and statements at the time of the transfer, but afterward when she was informed by the plaintiff that she had withdrawn a portion of the fund and applied the same to her own individual uses.

[2] We are further of the opinion that the evidence adduced at the trial brings this case within the purview and intent of section 16 of the Banking Act (St. 1909, p. 90, as amended by stats. 1911, p. 1003); and that the writing in question, taken in connection with the acts and conduct of the parties at the time of and after its execution, was sufficient to constitute the plaintiff and Mary Anne Holland joint tenants in said fund with the right of survivorship in the latter upon the death of the donor. In such case her title to the whole of said deposit at the time this action was brought would be complete. Clary v. Fitzgerald, 155 App. Div. 659, 140 N. Y. Supp. 536.

For the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the judgment is supported by the evidence, and that the court otherwise committed no error justifying the granting of a new trial.

Judgment and order affirmed.

RODEMEYER v. MEGER. (Civ. 1985.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 22, 1916.)

1. EASEMENTS ⇐16—IMPLIED GRANT.

Under Civ. Code, § 1104, providing that the transfer of real property passes all easements appurtenant thereto, and under section 1084, declaring that a transfer of a thing transfers all its incidents unless expressly excepted, where the owner of land divides it into two or more parts and conveys one part, he thereby conveys by implication all such easements as are necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the part granted in the form in which it was used at the time of the transfer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 43; Dec. Dig. ⇐16.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇐154(1)—EASEMENTS—TRANSFER OF LAND.

Where a water conduit extending through all of grantor's land had been for more than two years used obviously and permanently as the only means of irrigation, the sale of a part of such lands passes title to the grantee to an easement in the use of such conduit in bringing water across the land retained by the grantor.

3. TRIAL ⇐395(7)—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

On appeal by plaintiff from an adverse judgment in an action to enjoin interference with his easement to a water right, a conclusion of law that plaintiff was not entitled to run water over defendant's land will not justify an affirmance, where such conclusion is not based on proper findings of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Carl Rodemeyer against G. Meger. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

F. C. Spencer, of Anaheim, for appellant. Tipton & Cailor, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant; the action being one wherein plaintiff sought to have defendant enjoined from interfering with an irrigating ditch extending over the latter's land, through and by means of which plaintiff claimed the right to conduct a flow of water for irrigating his land.

As alleged in the complaint, defendant was the owner of a 20-acre tract of land which on January 31, 1912, he conveyed to plaintiff, together "with the tenements, hereditaments, easements, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or appertaining"; defendant reserving therefrom, however, three-fourths of an acre out of the northeast corner of said tract.

(We will designate the 19¼ acres of land conveyed to plaintiff as "tract 1," and the three-fourths of an acre reserved by defendant as "tract 2.") At the time of conveying tract 1 to plaintiff, and for some two years prior thereto, there existed an open ditch or conduit extending along the entire east side of the 20-acre tract, through and by means of which water was conducted for irrigating the same, of which fact plaintiff at the time of his purchase had knowledge. After purchasing tract 1 plaintiff, without objection from defendant, and up to June, 1913, used that part of the ditch extending over and along the east side of tract 2 so reserved by defendant as a means for conducting a supply of water to tract 1 for irrigating the same and the growing crops thereon, as defendant had done when owner thereof. No other means exist whereby plaintiff can obtain a supply of water, and irreparable injury will follow his failure to obtain such supply. In June, 1913, defendant obstructed the flow of water in the ditch extending across tract 2 and connecting with plaintiff's ditch and land, and refused to allow plaintiff to convey water through the same.

In his answer defendant denied that he conveyed to plaintiff any easement or right to convey water across tract 2 so reserved by him or to use the ditch thereon, and, on the contrary, alleged that plaintiff agreed that defendant should retain in himself the exclusive right to and use of the ditch on tract 2, together with the right as well to run water through the ditch over tract 1 sold to plaintiff. He also alleged that the conduit in question now existing along the east side of tract 2 "is not the same ditch used by defendant in irrigating the said 20 acres of land prior to the time of the sale of the property herein to plaintiff," but that prior to the sale of said land to plaintiff there had been no permanent ditch of any kind upon said tract, and that the ditch now located along the east side of tract 2 was and is and has been a temporary ditch, and that the same has been plowed in and filled up many times by this defendant with the knowledge of the plaintiff.

Section 1104 of the Civil Code provides:

"A transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto, and creates in favor thereof an easement to use other real property of the person whose estate is transferred in the same manner and to the same extent as such property was obviously and permanently used by the person whose estate is transferred, for the benefit thereof, at the time when the transfer was agreed upon or completed."

And section 1084 of the Civil Code provides that:

"The transfer of a thing transfers also all its incidents, unless expressly excepted."

[1] The law seems to be well settled that, where an owner of property divides it into two parts and grants one of such parts, such grant, by implication, includes all such easements in the remaining part as are necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the part granted in the form in which it was used at time of the transfer. Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135; Quinlan v. Noble, 75 Cal. 250, 17 Pac. 69.

[2] Respondent, however, as stated, alleged in his answer that by the terms of the grant to plaintiff he retained in himself the exclusive right to use all that part of the ditch extending over and across the $\frac{3}{4}$ -acre tract designated as tract 2, and also alleged that the ditch in question was not obviously and permanently used, but merely temporarily used. The determination of the question involved depends upon the answer to the issues thus tendered. If, as alleged by plaintiff, defendant conveyed the land to him, together with the easements appurtenant thereto, and this conduit extending over and across the tract reserved by defendant was and had been for more than two years obviously and permanently used by defendant when owner of the entire tract of land as the only means of conveying water thereto for irrigating crops growing thereon, then plaintiff, under the authority cited, was entitled to the use of the ditch in the same manner and to the same extent as defendant had used it before selling the land.

[3] The court, however, failed to make any finding upon either of these issues; and for this reason the judgment must be reversed. The conclusion of law as found by the court that plaintiff was not entitled to run water over the $\frac{3}{4}$ -acre tract cannot aid respondent on appeal, for the reason there is no finding of fact upon which to base such conclusion; nor does the finding that "said water was run from other pumping plants in the neighborhood through ditches more or less indefinitely, irregularly, and temporarily constructed on both tracts" aid in a determination of the case. The question is whether or not plaintiff was and is entitled to conduct water over tract 2 owned by defendant, and, as stated, that depends upon material issues as to which the court has made no answer in the findings.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Marcelle Koch against L. O. Wilcoxon and John Doherty. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Doherty appeals. Affirmed.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles (Charles A. Bank, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Ingall W. Bull, of Los Angeles (Walter E. Burke, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying to defendant Doherty a new trial.

Plaintiff brought this action to quiet title to a certain lot of land in the county of Los Angeles. The main facts, as found by the trial judge and shown by the evidence in the bill of exceptions, are in brief as follows: Marcelle Koch, being the owner of the lot in question, while in the city of San Diego was interviewed by defendant, Wilcoxon, who claimed to have a purchaser for the lot in Los Angeles county. Wilcoxon stated that his purchaser would pay the sum of $6,500 in cash for the lot. He further stated that he did not have the name of the purchaser, but that, if plaintiff would make out a deed leaving the name of the grantee blank, he (Wilcoxon) would take the deed to Los Angeles, meet the purchaser, deliver the deed after inserting the name of such purchaser, and remit the amount of the purchase price forthwith to the plaintiff. The deed was made out accordingly on about the 22d day of February, 1912, in San Diego. The name of the grantee was first left in blank, but after plaintiff had acknowledged the deed in that form the notary made some suggestion as to the possible invalidity of such an instrument, so thereupon it was agreed that Wilcoxon's name should be inserted in order to enable the latter to complete the transaction of the sale according to his agreement. Wilcoxon took the deed and returned to the city of Los Angeles. The plaintiff received no money, and some months later, upon coming to the city of Los Angeles, found that Wilcoxon had not only occupied the house, which was upon the lot, with his family, but had also rented the same to a tenant from whom he collected $100 per month. Wilcoxon, when the return of the deed was demanded, first stated that he had mailed it to the plaintiff at San Diego, and later declared that the deed had been lost. On an examination of the records being made, the plaintiff discovered that the deed had been placed of record, which apparently transferred title to Wilcoxon. Prior to the making and recording of this deed to Wilcoxon, the defendant Doherty was a judgment creditor of Wilcoxon in the sum of $4,653. The judgment was obtained in a neighboring county, and an abstract thereof had been recorded in the offices of the county clerk and county recorder of Los Angeles county. Doherty, being unable to secure satisfaction of his judgment, afterward made some agreement of compromise with Wilcoxon whereby Doherty was to receive $2,000 in full payment of the judgment; $500 to be paid in cash; the balance in deferred payments. Wilcoxon did not fulfill his part of this contract requiring the payments on the judgment account. In the meantime Doherty, the judgment creditor, had discovered that title to the lot hereinbefore referred to stood in the name of Wilcoxon on the public records, and proceeded to have execution issued and levied upon the lot in order to subject the same to sale and satisfaction of his judgment. After this execution was issued and the levy made the plaintiff here brought this suit to quiet title to her lot; the complaint being in the form customarily used in such actions. A lis pendens was filed in the county recorder's office giving notice of the plaintiff's suit, but, notwithstanding this notice, which constructively advised the public and defendant Doherty of the claim made by the plaintiff that she was the owner of the lot, Doherty proceeded with the execution sale against the lot, and on the 5th day of September, 1912, the sale was held, Doherty bidding in the property for the sum of $2,000. Thereafter this action came to trial, and after the evidence had been introduced, which disclosed the facts to be as briefly set out in the foregoing, the court allowed the plaintiff to amend to conform to the proofs, and the complaint was thereupon amended accordingly. In this amended complaint the facts touching the making of the deed and its delivery to Wilcoxon were all set out. The prayer attached to the amended complaint was not only for a decree determining the title to the lot to be in the plaintiff as against the defendants, but, further, that Wilcoxon be required to reconvey to the plaintiff. Incidentally it may be here remarked that some point is made that by the prayer of the amended complaint plaintiff asked for relief to which she was not entitled under the first complaint filed, to wit, as to the requirement for a reconveyance. The prayer of the first complaint, in addition to asking that the title of plaintiff be quieted and defendants be adjudged to have no right, title, or interest in the premises, demanded other and further relief such as might be equitable. The appellant, Doherty, is not in a position to complain of the judgment upon the amended complaint requiring the reconveyance to be made by Wilcoxon. Wilcoxon is not appealing, and he suffered judgment to go against him without contest. It is insisted that the court had not the right to permit the plaintiff to amend to the extent of setting out acts amounting to fraud on the part of Wilcoxon, because to do so would be to change the cause of action first declared upon by the plaintiff.

[1-3] Amendments under our practice are liberally allowed, and in the main that matter rests within the discretion of the trial court. Such amendments may be made to a complaint either during the trial or after the evidence is all in. Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 365, 51 Pac. 549, 955; Brown v. Hurst et al., 1 Cal. App. 752, 82 Pac. 1056. An amendment to conform to the proof may always be made, provided the cause of action is not thereby changed. Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 74 Pac. 44.

[4] The amendment in this case did not change the cause of action. In effect, it merely set out in detail the facts showing how the apparent title to the lot happened to stand in Wilcoxon's name and that no consideration had been rendered by Wilcoxon for the deed. The case of Henry v. Phillips, 163 Cal. 135, 124 Pac. 837, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 39, is direct authority for permitting such an amendment to be made in an action to quiet title.

[5] Appellant further contends that, having voluntarily inserted the name of Wilcoxon in the deed and delivered it to him, plaintiff could not thereafter assert that the conveyance was other than what it purported to be, to wit, a bona fide transaction for value. This statement is too far-reaching in its suggestion of the legal situation which arises upon such assumed facts. Very often property standing in the name of one person is determined to be held in trust for another, and such a conveyance is always open to proof as to where the real ownership resides unless innocent third persons have parted with value in reliance upon the integrity of the apparent title of the record holder. Section 1056 of the Civil Code, which declares that a grant cannot be delivered to the grantee conditionally, has no application. In Kimball v. Tripp, 136 Cal. 631, 69 Pac. 428, we find this expression:

"The position of the appellant on this point is that, as there was no fraud in the procurement of the conveyances, the plaintiff can have no relief. But, assuming the absence of fraud (though, in view of the defendant's relation to the grantor as her agent, this can hardly be assumed), it does not follow that equity cannot afford relief. The deeds, it is found, were made to the defendant simply as her agent, and were therefore taken by him in trust for her; and, though the trust was not expressed in writing, equity will not permit the defendant to convert the property to his own use, contrary to the intention of the parties and to the confidence reposed in him. * * * 'Where the circumstances of a transaction are such that the person who takes the title to property cannot be permitted to enjoy it, in whole or in part, without necessarily violating some principle of equity, a constructive trust will be raised for the party entitled in equity to its beneficial enjoyment'—which is the same principle that, at law, governs the action for money had and received. This principle has not always been consistently applied by the courts; but in this state it has been held applicable to cases where there were fiduciary relations between the parties, as in this case. * * * There is also another principle upon which the rule may be sustained, which is that in such cases generally, and in this case especially, there is an entire failure of consideration."

In this case, not only was the fraud of the agent shown, but there was an utter failure of consideration under the facts disclosed by the evidence and afterwards detailed in the amended complaint. We think that both the original complaint and the complaint as amended stated a good cause of action.

[6] Appellant insists that, as a purchaser at the execution sale, he was an innocent party, and was entitled to rely upon the record title, as it was shown to be in Wilcoxon. The question as to whether a judgment creditor who bids at his own execution sale is an innocent purchaser within the rule adverted to is not held by unanimous decision of the courts. Our Supreme Court, however, has given countenance to the proposition that such a creditor purchaser is entitled to the same favor under the law as would be extended to a third party who might purchase at such a sale. Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 575, 32 Pac. 579, 21 L. R. A. 33, 33 Am. St. Rep. 209. But a purchaser at an execution sale, in order to maintain his title as against the claim of a third person, must have purchased without any notice that the title was other than the record showed it to be. In Riley v. Martinelli, supra, section 336 from Freeman on Executions is quoted as follows:

"The purchaser at an execution sale takes his title subject to such liens, easements, and equities as it was subject to in the hands of the defendant in execution, unless he can show that he is a purchaser in good faith, and without any notice, actual or constructive, of the existence of such lien, easement, or equity."

[7, 8] Notice which will charge the purchaser necessarily is any legal notice which he may have received of the defect in the title prior to the occurrence of the sale and the payment of his money. Murphy v. Clayton, 113 Cal. 153, 45 Pac. 267; Scott v. Umbarger, 41 Cal. 419. The notice of lis pendens filed prior to the making of the sale on execution gave notice to all intended purchasers that the plaintiff herein claimed to be the owner of the lot which it was proposed to have sold on execution process. Section 409, Code Civ. Proc.

For the reasons given, we are convinced that the defendant Doherty obtained no title or interest in the lot by reason of his purchase at the execution sale, and that the judgment of the court quieting title against him is right.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

One presenting false proofs in support of a claim upon a policy of accident insurance is not guilty of a public offense, under Pen. Code, §§ 548, 549, which has reference only to false or fraudulent proofs of claim under policies for the insurance of property.

Habeas corpus on the petition of Newton Wilson. Writ granted, and petitioner discharged from custody.

Davis & Rush, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and George E. Cryer, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The petitioner is held in custody by the sheriff of Los Angeles county under a commitment issued out of the superior court. The commitment has been issued pursuant to a judgment pronounced against petitioner in a criminal action and requiring that he be punished by imprisonment in the state prison. Petitioner's claim that the commitment is illegal and void is based upon the proposition that the information in the action does not charge a public offense.

[1] The accusation set forth in the information was that the defendant committed the crime of presenting false proofs in support of a claim upon a policy of insurance; the policy in question being one of insurance against accident. If any offense is charged against the petitioner by that information, it must be an offense coming within the terms of section 549 of the Penal Code. If that section does not include the presentation of a false or fraudulent claim, or proofs in support of such claim, upon a contract of accident insurance, then the information states no criminal offense. Sections 548 and 549 are contained in chapter xi of title xiii, part I, of the Penal Code. The chapter heading and section headings pertinent to this chapter and these sections have not been changed, nor have the sections been amended since the enactment of the Code in 1872. The chapter heading is, "Fraudulent destruction of property insured." The headnote of section 548 is, "Burning or destroying property insured." The headnote of section 549 is, "Presenting false proofs in support of a claim upon policy of insurance." These are not mere editor's notes, but are integral parts of the Code itself. This will be seen by referring to the commissioners' certificate following the title page of the Penal Code in its original edition and the statutory provisions therein mentioned. The same situation exists with respect to the other Codes of this state adopted at the same time. In Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, at page 16, 16 Pac. 345, at page 352, referring to the Civil Code, the Supreme Court said:

"Each article of the Code is preceded by headnotes, numbered to correspond with the sections following, and purporting to give in brief the subject of each of such sections. These headnotes are entitled to more consideration than the 'title' to an entire act. They are parts of the statute limiting and defining the sections to which they refer. To refuse to give effect to them according to their import would be to make the law, not to administer it."

In Bettencourt v. Sheehy, 157 Cal. 698, 109 Pac. 89, referring to the marginal notes contained in the original edition of the Political Code, it was said:

"The marginal notes to the sections of the original codes cannot be distinguished in principle from the headnotes to the chapters, articles, and titles. As to these it has been held that they are parts of the statute limiting and defining the sections to which they refer, and that to refuse to give effect to them according to their import would be to make the law, not to administer it."

[2] Reading together the chapter title and the headnotes, together with the text of sections 548 and 549, we find that the offenses therein described have reference to cases in which property has been destroyed or injured, or where false or fraudulent claims or proofs of claim are presented upon contracts of insurance against losses incident to injury to property or destruction thereof. The failure of the Legislature to give to this chapter a broader scope, so as to include accident insurance, may be attributed to the fact that insurance contracts of that kind are of modern origin, and in the year 1872 casualty insurance was not yet a common or well-known class of business. Being of the opinion that the information does not state or describe a criminal offense, we conclude that the petitioner is entitled to be released, and it is therefore ordered that he be discharged from custody.

Action by C. Harpold against Thos. A. Slocum and J. H. Slocum. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

B. P. Welch and J. R. Jaffray, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. Andrews, Toland & Andrews, Thos. O. Toland, and Cedric E. Johnson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and from an order denying to the defendants a new trial.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover on a promissory note for the principal sum of $1,750, dated November 28, 1910, and maturing one year after date. Defendants answering did not deny the execution of the note nor the fact as alleged that nothing had been paid thereon, but affirmatively alleged that:

"Said note, at the time of its execution and delivery, was, and ever since has been, a security given by these defendants to the plaintiff for the faithful performance on their part of a certain agreement before that time entered into between said parties, which agreement is in words and figures as follows:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 2d day of December, 1909, by and between C. Harpold of Santa Paula, state of California, and Thos. A. Slocum and J. H. Slocum of Los Angeles, state aforesaid, each with the other witnesseth: That all three of the parties are the owners of a certain house and lot, on Twenty-Fifth street near San Pedro, for which they have traded the garage in Santa Paula, on which building C. Harpold owned a mortgage for one thousand (1,000) dollars, therefore, be it understood and agreed between all parties hereto, that as consideration for surrendering the mortgage, aforesaid, the said C. Harpold shall receive as an interest in such property, or out of any money received for the sale of the aforesaid house and lot, or any trade that is made on or with said property as a basis, the first thousand (1,000) dollars after which all the remainder shall be divided among the several parties hereto in equal parts. It is understood and agreed among the three parties to this agreement that for convenience in handling the deed shall be made out in the name of Thos. A. Slocum, though the ownership shall be held in all three in the ratio aforesaid and that the said Thos. A. Slocum shall act as trustee. In witness whereof we hereby set our hands and seal the year and day above written. C. Harpold. Thos. A. Slocum. J. H. Slocum."

This allegation followed:

"Defendants further state that there was no other consideration for the giving of said note than that it should be such security; that no consideration has passed to either of them or from said plaintiff for said note; and that plaintiff has not given up or assigned to defendants or to any one for them his rights under said agreement of trust. * * *

The genuineness and due execution of the contract set out in the answer, and above quoted, was admitted. Section 448, Code Civ. Proc. Upon trial being had, objections to evidence offered on the part of the defendants to show the consideration for the note and that such consideration was only as they had alleged in their answer were sustained. The trial court took the view that to allow such evidence would be to permit the varying of the terms of a written instrument. It will be observed that the note was executed almost one year after the making of the contract which is set out in the answer. This contract contained no condition for the giving of security to the plaintiff. It was complete in its recital of the things agreed upon by the parties. When the note was given the time had not arrived when the defendants were called upon to account; in other words, the contract had not matured. Under such a condition of fact, the giving of the note would appear to have been a gratuitous act, rendered without legal consideration moving to the makers of the note. This, of course, assuming the allegations of the answer to be true. The question is, not whether the defendants might be able to maintain by sufficient evidence the claim set up by way of defense, but whether they should have been allowed to offer competent evidence to support the plea as made. We think the court erred in sustaining the objections. This was not a case which involved any rights of an innocent holder for value, but the action was directly between the parties to the original transaction.

Some objection has been made to the sufficiency of the record presented. The irregularities complained of, we think, are not sufficient to justify us in discarding the record in considering the appeal.

The judgment and order are reversed.

SMITH v. REIS. (Civ. 1278.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 26, 1916.)

SALES §52(5) — CONTRACT OF SALE — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

In action for half the proceeds of the sale of a stallion, held that, in view of conflicting evidence and the improbabilities of plaintiff's statement, a finding that defendant had not sold to plaintiff a half interest in the stallion was warranted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 136, 137, 139; Dec. Dig. §52(5).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckels, Judge.

Action by Joe Smith against A. M. Reis. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Bell, of Napa, for appellant. L. G. Harrier and Harlow V. Greenwood, both of Vallejo, for respondent.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that on a certain day he and the defendant were the owners, as tenants in common, of a certain stallion named. He alleges that defendant has sold the stallion for $1,500 and has not accounted to him for any part thereof, and asks judgment against him for $750. The defendant, by his answer, denies that plaintiff ever owned any interest in the stallion, and alleges that he was the sole owner thereof. The court found that plaintiff was not, and never had been, the owner of any interest in the stallion, and made findings and judgment in favor of the defendant. The appeal is taken solely on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

It appears that the plaintiff and defendant are both Portuguese, and do not express themselves clearly in our language, and hence the testimony is somewhat involved. It is gathered from the record that the plaintiff's testimony was to the effect that defendant agreed with him that if he would pay certain expenses that had been incurred in the care and keeping of the horse, amounting to some $70, the horse was to be his. He paid these expenses, and thereby became the owner of the horse, but subsequently agreed with the defendant that if he would pay plaintiff $115, the amount that had been paid out by plaintiff on account of the horse, then when the horse was sold defendant was to have one-half of the price he might be sold for. The defendant gives an entirely different version of the whole transaction. He testifies he never sold the plaintiff any interest in the stallion; that plaintiff, as a friend, did pay certain bills due for the care and keep of the horse, but that all this was paid back to him. Without setting out his testimony, it is sufficient to say that if believed by the trial court it was entirely sufficient to justify the finding made. The court may well have considered the improbabilities of the plaintiff's statement that defendant sold him a stallion for $70 which, if not worth it, he claims was afterwards sold for $1,500. The trial court, in summing up the case, said:

"It seems to me that Mr. Reis has made a statement that is clear. I see no reason to doubt it; and there are some things in the other statement that do not seem clear."

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CAVANAUGH. (Cr. 446.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Jan. 31, 1916. On Rehearing, May 11, 1916.)

1. RAPE $\S$ 11—FORCE AND THREATS—SUBMISSION TO OFFICER.

Submission by the prosecutrix merely because she believed the accused to be an officer, and that he would arrest her if she refused, is insufficient to make out the crime of rape.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 11.]

2. RAPE $\S$ 14—RESISTANCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Since, under Pen. Code, § 263, rape is complete on physical penetration, prosecutrix' resistance to the full extent of her ability need continue to, and be overcome only to, the time of penetration, regardless of her subsequent acts.

3. RAPE $\S$ 59(17)—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where prosecutrix first stated that defendant said he was an officer and would arrest her, before the offense, and later stated that such threat followed the offense, it was for the jury to say which statement was true; and therefore refusal of instruction that rape is not made out by submission under threat of arrest was erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Pat Cavanaugh was convicted of rape, and from the judgment and order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed. On rehearing, judgment and order reversed.

Walton J. Wood, Public Defender, and Graham F. Putnam, Dep. Public Defender, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment sentencing him to serve a term of 14 years in the state prison, and also from an order denying his application made to the court for a new trial. It was charged in the information that on the 3d day of May, 1913, the crime of rape was committed by the defendant upon Lizzie Allen, and that the resistance of prosecutrix was overcome by means of threats made by defendant to do her great bodily injury.

The prosecutrix was a married woman and lived on East Sixth street in the city of Los Angeles with her four children, the eldest of which was 12 years of age. She testified that at the time alleged her husband was absent in another part of the state, and that she had as a roomer a young man who occupied a room in the upper portion of the house; that a lady friend was visiting her at the time; that she went to the door in answer to the defendant's summons, and he inquired regarding a room, the use of which he proposed to engage from her; that she showed him through two rooms at least, and that, while she was in a room fronting the street, defendant caught her by the arm, drew a revolver, and threatened to shoot her or hit her if she made an outcry; that he forced her over upon a bed in the room, returning the revolver to a pocket, so that he might have the use of both hands, and that he then accomplished an act of sexual intercourse with her. She stated that she made no outcry and offered no resistance because of the threats which he made; that immediately after the act had been completed defendant told her that he was an officer, and that he had been sent down from the chief of police to arrest her because she had been intoxicated; that she went into the rear of the building to perform some act of a personal nature and that he followed her there; that shortly thereafter he went away, stating that he would see the chief of police and ascertain whether the charge could not be dropped, and would return later in the day; that she told the lady friend, who had remained in an adjoining room, of the occurrence, and later the same day told the young man who occupied the room upstairs; that about 8 o'clock in the evening of the same day the defendant returned and was admitted; that he talked for some time, but left, upon her suggesting that she and the children desired to go to bed; that about the hour of 11 o'clock of the same evening he returned again and was admitted by her, and that he then stated that he would be compelled to take her to the police station; that she remonstrated, and stated to him that it was late, and she would telephone to the chief of police and ask him whether the matter of the arrest could not be deferred until morning; that the defendant accompanied her to the telephone, but that before she had time to use the phone he said that he would not arrest her that night; that thereupon he went away and did not return again until about three days later; that when he did return, the police officers had been informed, and were there to investigate the matter, and when the defendant entered the house he was arrested. The officers, upon arresting him, found a "star" in his clothing, and one of the officers testified that a conversation was had with defendant after his arrest. This witness said:

"Mrs. Allen repeated her story in front of the defendant as to the act that he had committed at 920 East Sixth street, and after she got through we asked the defendant what about the story, as to the truth about it, and he stated that he had been over to this woman's house and that he did pose as an officer, and that he had this star and that he had the gun, and he further stated that he did not draw the gun on her at no time, and that he did have sexual intercourse with her, but it was at her solicitation."

Defendant on his own behalf testified that he was acquainted with a sister of prosecutrix who had asked him to speak to the prosecutrix regarding her habit of drinking and having illicit relations with other men; that prior to the day mentioned in the information he had had no acquaintance with the prosecutrix, but that he did call at her house, looking for a room. Regarding the alleged intercourse, he testified that after looking at the room he began to tell the prosecutrix what her sister had requested him to relate, the effect of which was that people had been seen watching the house, and that she should not live in the way that she was; that, if she did not mend her ways, the police would take her children away from her. He testified that thereupon she threw her arms around his neck and told him not to say anything about it, and that she would do better and would consent to anything that he might want; that thereupon, at his suggestion, she permitted an act of sexual intercourse to take place between them.

This brief abstract, as we have stated it, presents the gist of the testimony offered by the prosecution to sustain the charge and the defense made to it. It must appear, then, very clearly that the determination of what the real facts were was a matter peculiarly within the province of the jury. It is, we think, very properly argued by the public defender, who appears as counsel for appellant, that the entire statement made by the prosecutrix, considered strictly in the light of the charge, was one to which the jury should have given most close and careful scrutiny. Attention is called to the fact that the actions of the prosecutrix immediately succeeding the alleged attack were rather short of those which ordinarily would be evidenced by a woman who had been abused and outraged in the way that the prosecutrix claimed the appellant had treated her. Whether she believed that the man was an officer or not, it would seem a most unlikely thing that a virtuous woman would have admitted the perpetrator of such an outrage into her house twice on the same day and after the alleged assault had been committed, without protest and without some attempt to have him apprehended upon the charge which was later made.

But, conceding all this to be true, the jury had the right to determine the truth of the matter under proper instructions of the court as to the law. Turning to the instructions as given, we find that the trial judge did quite fully cover the matters pertinent to the charge. Instructions were given advising the jury that the testimony of the prosecutrix should be carefully scanned, and that, in order to warrant a conviction, the jury must believe that the prosecutrix was prevented from resisting the assault by threats of great and immediate bodily harm, accompanied by apparent power of execution, and that if she was not so prevented the crime of rape would not be made out.

[1] Counsel for appellant offered an instruction in further emphasis of these propositions, and also asked that the jury be advised that the crime charged would not be made out, if it appeared that the prosecutrix' submission was brought about because of her belief that the man was an officer and that he would arrest her. No fault can be found with this instruction as to the correctness of the law announced therein, but the evidence was such as to authorize the court to refuse it. The testimony of the prosecutrix was that no statement was made by appellant, prior to the completion of the act of intercourse, to the effect that he was an officer, but that all of that was said afterwards. The defendant himself does not assert that he told the prosecutrix that he was an officer, although he intimates that she might have assumed that he was. Had the testimony shown that, before or at the time the assault was committed, one of the threats made by appellant had been that he would or was about to arrest the prosecutrix, then the instruction would have been pertinent and timely and we think it would have been error to refuse it. The instruction as given by the court, covering the matter of the necessity that it be shown that resistance was overcome by force or threat of great bodily harm, seems complete.

[2] Counsel argues that he was entitled to have the jury informed in addition that the resistance must have been "to the full extent of her ability throughout the entire act." The crime was complete at the time physical penetration was effected with the woman (Pen. Code, § 263), and, if her resistance was overcome up to that point by any of the unlawful means denounced by the statute, we apprehend it would make no difference whether she afterwards lost her fear or made no attempt to resist the further encroachments of her assailant. Appellate courts have repeatedly said that in this class of cases it becomes the duty of trial judges and juries to scan closely the evidence offered in proof of the charge, and this duty is one particularly to be observed where the evidence consists in substance of the assertion by the one witness of incriminating facts and a denial by the defendant. Such charges are, as has been truly said, easily made and, because of the innate chivalry of jurors, difficult to effectually refute. The defendant in this case will be subjected to an exceedingly long term of imprisonment. We must assume, however, that the trial jury and judge were entirely satisfied as to the sufficiency of the evidence and that the judge deemed it such a case as justified the infliction of very severe punishment. The points discussed in the foregoing are those which are mainly relied upon in support of appellant's appeal, and we find in the record no other alleged error which calls for particular discussion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

On Rehearing.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape and sentenced to serve a term of 14 years in the penitentiary. He presented a motion for a new trial, which being denied, an appeal was taken from the order and also from the judgment. The information charged that the crime was accomplished by means of force and that the prosecutrix was prevented from resisting because of threats made by the defendant that he would kill her; that defendant exhibited a loaded revolver and pointed it at the head of the prosecutrix as an evidence of his ability to carry out his threats. The prosecutrix was a married woman and lived with her four children in the lower part of the city of Los Angeles. She testified that, at the time of the alleged assault, her husband was absent in another part of the state, and that she had as a roomer a young man who occupied a room in the upper portion of the house. She also stated that, at the time of the alleged rape, a lady friend was visiting her and was present in an adjoining room. She testified that she went to the door in answer to defendant's knock and that he made inquiry regarding a room, claiming that he wanted to rent one, and that, after showing him through two rooms and while in one of the bedrooms, defendant caught her by the arm, drew a revolver, and threatened to shoot her if she made any outcry and did not consent to his proposal; that he forced her over upon a bed and thereupon had sexual intercourse with her. She further testified that after the act had been accomplished she went into the kitchen; that he came with her, and that while she was busy about her toilet he talked to her. She further testified that defendant claimed to be an officer, and said that he had been sent by the chief of police to arrest the prosecutrix for intoxication. She further testified that defendant returned twice that day, once in the early part of the evening and the last time at about 11 o'clock that night. She stated that she made no immediate complaint to any one regarding the conduct of the defendant and on the occasion of each of his later visits she admitted him into the house and talked with him further. Her excuse for so doing was that she believed that he was an officer and would make trouble for her if she did not. At the time of his arrest it was found that defendant did have some sort of a star, such we assume as might be worn by an officer, and that he had carried a revolver.

[3, 4] When this case was first considered, an opinion was written ordering that the judgment and order be affirmed. Upon application thereafter made, a rehearing was granted. One of the chief errors claimed to have been committed by the trial court was in refusing to give an instruction offered by the defendant, advising the jury that, if they found that the prosecutrix' consent to the intercourse was obtained because of her belief that the man was an officer and would arrest her, and not because of the threats to do her great bodily injury, defendant was entitled to an acquittal. Treating of that point in our former opinion, we said:

"No fault can be found with this instruction as to the correctness of the law announced therein, but the evidence was such as to authorize the court to refuse it. The testimony of the prosecutrix was that no statement was made by appellant prior to the completion of the act of intercourse to the effect that he was an officer, but all of that was said afterwards. * * * Had the testimony shown that, before or at the time the assault was committed, one of the threats made by appellant had been that he would or was about to arrest the prosecutrix, then the instruction would have been pertinent and timely, and we think it would have been error to refuse it."

We have re-examined the testimony given by the prosecutrix. As stated in the former opinion, she did finally say that the alleged statements made by the defendant, to the effect that he was an officer and would arrest her, were made after the intercourse had been had. It is insisted, however, that, inasmuch as the witness at first stated that the defendant made his claim of being an officer and his threat of arrest at the time the witness alleged he pulled the gun, and before the intercourse occurred, notwithstanding that she contradicted this finally, it was a matter for the jury to say and determine as to which of her statements they would believe. We are inclined to adopt this view as being the correct one to be taken, and with that conclusion in mind, it appears clear that the instruction offered by the appellant should have been given. And we think the error was prejudicial. The general statement of the prosecutrix showed marks of improbability. It is hardly consistent with the attitude of a woman who had been, at the point of a revolver, compelled to submit to the embraces of an assailant, that no complaint should have immediately been made to the authorities, and that, twice on the same day, the prosecutrix should have admitted the same man to her house and there conversed with him. An occurrence such as the prosecutrix described would most naturally seem to call for immediate complaint and the denunciation of the perpetrator at the earliest possible moment. All of these reflections give color to the claim of the public defender, who appeared for the defendant in this case at the trial, that the prosecutrix did consent to the act of intercourse under the belief that Cavanaugh was a peace officer and for the purpose of purchasing immunity from arrest or molestation by him.

[5] The mere threat to arrest her would not be a threat to use such force and violence as are described in section 261 of the Penal Code. Defendant on his part admitted that the act of intercourse had taken place between him and the prosecutrix, and testified that the prosecutrix might have inferred that he was an officer; that he went to her house at the request of a relative of hers to endeavor to persuade her not to continue her drinking habits, and that she placed her arms around his neck and told him not to say anything about it and she would do better and would consent to anything he wanted, and that thereupon she voluntarily offered to have intercourse with him. It would seem natural that the jury would condemn the attitude adopted by the defendant in allowing the prosecutrix to assume that he was an officer, if they so believed; and, in that state of the case, it became important to the defendant to have the jury fully advised that he could not be convicted of the crime charged solely because of any belief on the part of the prosecutrix that he was an officer and would arrest her unless she gave her consent to the act.

In their general substance, the instructions as given by the trial judge appear to have correctly stated the law. We think that, because of the one error specified, however, the appellant is entitled to a new trial.

The judgment and order are reversed.

The record of the proceedings, as made at time of pronouncement of judgment, under which petitioner in habeas corpus is being held, may be considered to ascertain whether the court had jurisdiction to render it against him.

2. HABEAS CORPUS $\hookrightarrow$ 94—QUESTION SUBMITTED—JURISDICTION.

The single question submitted by a habeas corpus proceeding is jurisdiction; and the injury is at an end on it appearing the court had jurisdiction to render the judgment, notwithstanding errors or irregularities which would have availed on appeal.

3. HABEAS CORPUS $\hookrightarrow$ 27—RENDERING SECOND JUDGMENT.

It cannot, on habeas corpus, be said that the court went beyond its power in setting aside a prior judgment for the same offense, and rendering the judgment under which petitioner is held; it not appearing that the first judgment was not illegal in substance or form, or that the sheriff was furnished a certified copy thereof as his authority for holding petitioner under said judgment.

but would merely constitute an error or irregularity to be availed of on appeal.

Application of Edward Long for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Paul C. Harlan, of Fairfield, for petitioner. Arthur Lindauer, of Vallejo, for respondent.

HART, J. The petitioner claims that he is unlawfully restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of Solano county, and asks that he be released from such restraint through the writ of habeas corpus. Because of the absence of the other justices of this court, the writ was made returnable before me. The general contention is that the said sheriff is holding the petitioner in his custody, and in confinement in the county jail of the county named, under a commitment based on a void judgment.

The petition alleges that the petitioner was, on the 17th day of January, 1916, regularly sentenced, by the superior court in and for the county of Solano, to imprisonment in the county jail of said county for the term of 90 days for selling alcoholic liquor within no-license territory in said county; that, immediately upon being sentenced, the petitioner was delivered to the custody of the sheriff of said county and by him was confined in the county jail under said judgment or sentence; that—

"said sentence commenced to run and said Edward Long commenced to serve and undergo said sentence on said January 17, 1916, and has been continuously ever since said January 17, 1916, and is now, imprisoned and confined in said county jail; that said Edward Long has served more than the said 90-days sentence, and is now, and has been, ever since April 17, 1916, restrained of his liberty by said sheriff as aforesaid, in said county jail, without legal warrant or excuse or authority."

The return of the sheriff to the writ consists of the commitment upon which he holds the petitioner in custody, and which is a duly certified copy of the judgment rendered and entered against the petitioner by the superior court of Solano county. Said commitment, after setting forth the title of the court and cause and designating the offense of which the petitioner was by the information accused, recites:

"The district attorney, with the defendant, came into court. The defendant was duly informed by the court of the nature of the information filed on the 17th day of January, 1916, charging him with the crime of selling liquor in no-license territory, committed on the 11th day of January, 1916, of his arraignment and plea of guilty as charged. The defendant was then asked if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him, to which he replies that he has none. And no sufficient cause being shown or appearing to the court, thereupon the court rendered its judgment: That, whereas the said Edward Long having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of selling liquor in no-license territory, it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Edward Long be punished by imprisonment in the county jail of Solano county for the term of five months and that he pay a fine of $100. The defendant was then remanded to the sheriff of Solano county to be by him so imprisoned."

The return was not formally traversed or controverted or demurred to. The petitioner, however, filed and introduced in evidence a certified copy of certain entries made by the clerk of the trial court in the criminal register of said court, disclosing that a judgment of imprisonment for 90 days in the county jail of Solano county and a fine of $50 had been pronounced against the petitioner, prior to the time at which the judgment, under which he is now undergoing punishment, was pronounced.

[1] At the hearing before me, evidence, oral and documentary, relating to the proceedings involving the rendition of both the first and second judgments, was offered and objected to by the district attorney of Solano county, representing the respondent, and by the attorney for the petitioner. These objections (by the district attorney) were based upon the ground that a judgment in a criminal case, valid on its face, cannot, in a collateral proceeding, be impeached by evidence dehors the judgment or the record itself. My conclusion is that the record of the proceedings, as made in the court below, at the time of the pronouncement of judgment, may be considered for the purpose of ascertaining whether the judgment under which the petitioner is now being held was or was not one which the court had jurisdiction to render against the accused. Ex parte Dela, 25 Nev. 346, 60 Pac. 217, 83 Am. St. Rep. 603, and cases therein cited.

The offense to which the petitioner pleaded guilty, and for which he is now undergoing the imprisonment of which he here complains, consisted of his violation of the local option law passed by the Legislature of 1911. Stats. 1911, p. 599. Section 19 of said act prescribes the following penalties for the violation of the provisions thereof:

"Any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $600, or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding seven months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; but any person found guilty of violating any of the provisions of this act, by conviction for an offense committed after a previous conviction under this act, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $600 nor less than $100, and by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding seven months, nor less than one month."

It will be observed that, by the foregoing section, the court is authorized to impose a heavier penalty in the case of a prior conviction of the accused of the crime of violating the provisions of said statute.

The specific contention of the petitioner is: (1) That, since there is no allegation in the information of a prior conviction of the petitioner of an offense against the statute in question, the court was without jurisdiction to pronounce against him a sentence, conformably to the theory of a prior conviction. (2) That, when the court, on the 17th day of January, rendered judgment against the petitioner, and the latter thereupon delivered over to the sheriff to be by that officer confined in the county jail in execution of said judgment, the court then and thereupon lost all further jurisdiction of the case, and, therefore, exceeded its jurisdiction in setting aside the said judgment and pronouncing another and different judgment; that the later judgment is, consequently, absolutely void.

The proceeding before me as it now stands is: That the return made to the writ, showing the authority of the sheriff for holding the prisoner, contains a duly certified copy of the judgment, whereby the petitioner was, on the 18th day of January, 1916, sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail of Solano county for the term of five months and to pay a fine of $100; that, to overcome or countervail the effect of said judgment, the petitioner has presented, not a certified copy of another and different judgment for the same offense, but the record of entries in the criminal register of the trial court, showing that on the 17th day of January, 1916, the petitioner had been sentenced to imprisonment for a term of three months and to pay a fine of $50 for (presumably) the same offense.

[2] The single question submitted by a proceeding in habeas corpus is always one of jurisdiction. If it appears that it was within the lawful jurisdiction of the court or tribunal to do the act or pronounce the judgment assailed through such a proceeding, then the inquiry is at an end, even though it be made to appear that the court or the tribunal, in doing the act or pronouncing the judgment, committed irregularities or errors which, on appeal, might be held sufficient to vitiate the act or judgment.

[3] It will not for a moment be doubted that the court had jurisdiction to pronounce such a judgment as the one here complained of, under the statute upon which the information filed against the petitioner is founded. Nor will it be doubted that, where a court has pronounced an illegal judgment or a judgment illegally in a case of which it has jurisdiction under the law, such court may thereafter, and before execution of such judgment is commenced, set the same aside and pronounce a legal judgment or a judgment in conformity to the requirements of the law. Ex parte Gilmore, 71 Cal. 624, 12 Pac. 800; Matter of Robbins, 27 Cal. App. 677, 151 Pac. 14. Neither the return to the writ nor the record in the case, as certified by the clerk of the court below, and presented as in answer to the return, discloses the reason for the making of the order vacating the purported judgment first rendered; and therefore it has not been made affirmatively to appear from the return or the answer thereto, nor, indeed, by any of the records of the case as presented here, whether the court had, in pronouncing the first judgment, exhausted its jurisdiction in this particular case so that it was without authority to set it aside and pronounce the second judgment. It does not affirmatively appear that, upon the rendition of the first judgment, or at any time, a certified copy of said judgment was furnished the sheriff, which certified copy is the sole warrant or authority necessary to justify or require the execution thereof by the sheriff. As has been shown, it is merely made to appear in the proceeding before me that the sheriff holds the prisoner on a commitment which, on its face, is valid and prima facie legal and sufficient to warrant the officer in restraining the petitioner; that the petitioner, in attempting to discharge the burden resting upon him to impeach the prima facie showing so made, introduced the entries in the register of criminal cases showing the previous judgment. I cannot perceive how the showing thus made by the petitioner can in a habeas corpus proceeding be held to be sufficient to disclose that the court had been divested of jurisdiction to pronounce the judgment last rendered. In other words, I cannot say, upon the showing made by the petitioner in impeachment of the commitment by authority of which the sheriff now detains him, is such as to require the latter to be disregarded or held to be illegal and invalid. Ex parte Williams, 89 Cal. 421, 425, 26 Pac. 887.

While it is true, as stated, that, upon the record of the case itself, the reason for the setting aside of the judgment pronounced on January 17th does not appear, it was nevertheless otherwise disclosed in this proceeding. The district attorney offered in evidence the stenographer's report of the proceedings in habeas corpus in this case before the superior court of Solano county, the petitioner having thus attempted to secure his discharge from custody, after he had served a term of three months in the county jail. While I do not regard the evidence so offered as material or important to the determination of the issue presented here, which involves, obviously, the single question whether the judgment herein and hereby assailed was within the jurisdiction of the court to impose, I shall briefly rehearse the facts as so disclosed, assuming them to be the admitted facts of the matter, since the evidence showing them was offered by the respondent and not denied by the petitioner. It appears from the said report of the stenographer that the petitioner was arraigned, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced late on the afternoon of the 17th day of January, and just about the time for the adjournment of the court for the day. After the case was disposed of, the judge and the county clerk left the courthouse together, and the conversation between them turned on the petitioner's case. The clerk asked the judge what sentence he had imposed, and, upon being informed by the judge of the extent of the punishment, the clerk suggested that the petitioner had once before been convicted of violating the same statute and stated that he could, therefore, not understand how the sentence, so far as the fine was concerned, could be less than $100. The judge replied that the matter had been rushed through, and that he had not had time to consider the provision of the statute as to a second conviction; that he would on the following morning set aside the judgment which he had pronounced, and render a judgment in accordance with the fact of the petitioner's previous conviction. It was further made to appear that, prior and up to the time of his arraignment and plea of guilty on the 17th, the petitioner had been in the custody of the sheriff and confined in the county jail awaiting trial upon the charge to which he on that day pleaded guilty; that, upon said judgment being pronounced, the sheriff immediately returned the prisoner to the county jail, said officer, as seen, having been furnished no certified copy of the said judgment as his authority for holding him under said judgment.

Conceding the above to be a true history of the proceedings involving the pronouncement and the setting aside of the first judgment and the rendition of the second judgment, still there is nothing therein from which it may be said that the court went beyond its power, legally, in setting aside the first judgment or acted in excess of its jurisdiction in pronouncing the second judgment. It is not made to appear by that evidence that the first judgment was not illegal in substance or form, and if the first judgment was illegal, the purported sentence thereunder could not begin to run upon the confinement of the petitioner in the county jail under such judgment; nor, indeed, could it legally begin to run at all.

[4] While it is the claim, and it may be true, that the second judgment was pronounced upon the theory of a prior conviction of the petitioner of a similar offense, it is also true that the penalty imposed by the court by its second judgment is one which may legally be inflicted where the accused has not been convicted of previously violating the local option law. And it cannot be told, from the judgment or the record itself of the proceedings in the court below, involving the sentencing of the petitioner, whether the judgment was based upon a first conviction only or upon a conviction and a prior conviction of a violation of the statute. The fact that it might have been based upon the theory of a second conviction is made to appear only, as has been shown, by the stenographer's report of the proceedings in habeas corpus before the superior court, after the petitioner had served 90 days of his sentence. But, conceding that the sentence was based on the provision of section 19 as to a prior conviction, still the jurisdiction of the court to pronounce the second judgment is not impeached by anything disclosed by the record before me.

It is true that the information does not charge a prior conviction under the local option law. Nor is it made to appear that the court, before pronouncing judgment, received evidence showing a prior conviction of the petitioner. But, assuming that, to have authorized the court to impose a penalty according to the fact of a prior conviction, it was essential that such prior conviction should have been pleaded and proved, or at the least proved, yet omission to plead the fact, if it was necessary to do so, or failure in any event to prove it, could not affect the jurisdiction of the court to pronounce the judgment, but would merely constitute an error or irregularity which would not render the judgment absolutely void, or subject it to annulment otherwise than through an appeal supported by a duly authenticated record disclosing the error or irregularity. Ex parte Max, 44 Cal. 579, 581.

My conclusion is, as must be manifest from the foregoing discussion, that want of jurisdiction in the court to pronounce the judgment challenged by this proceeding has not been shown.

The writ is therefore discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

GWYNN v. McKINLEY, Auditor of Placer County. (Civ. 1530.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1916.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE — 15 — COMPENSATION—STATUTE—CONSTITUTIONALITY — "INCREASING."

St. 1915, p. 323, § 13, providing for the classification of townships in counties of the thirty-first class according to population, for the purpose of fixing the compensation of justices of the peace, and providing that they shall receive in townships of the first class $900 for the period beginning with the date upon which the act became effective, and ending December 31, 1915, and thereafter a salary of $900 per annum, is not violative of Const. art. 11, § 9, providing that the compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term, as the act, providing compensation for justices of the peace in cases where the Legislature has previously made no provision whatever, after the adoption of Const. art. 6, § 15, abolishing the system of compensating judicial officers by fees, is not tantamount to "increasing" the compensation of such officers.

Original application for writ of mandamus by B. F. Gwynn against C. D. McKinley, as Auditor of the County of Placer, State of California. On demurrer to the petition. Writ directed to issue as prayed.

Lee Gray, of Colfax, for petitioner. Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an original application to this court for a writ of mandamus requiring the respondent, as auditor of the county of Placer, to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner for the salary or compensation of the latter, as justice of the peace of township No. 3 of said county, for the month of January, 1916.

The petition alleges that the petitioner is, and was, since the 1st day of January, 1915, the duly elected, qualified, and acting justice of the peace of said township; that the salary provided by law of said justice of the peace is $900 per annum, payable in the same manner and out of the same funds as county officers are paid, and that the respondent, as auditor of said county, has refused to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner for the said month of January, 1916, and still refuses so to do. The respondent has demurred to the petition generally, and thus the question to be decided is raised.

It appears that the petitioner and all other justices of the peace of Placer county were elected to said offices at the general state election held in November, 1914, and entered upon the discharge of their duties as such justices on the 1st day of January, 1915, their terms of office being four years. Prior and up to January 1, 1915, the compensation of justices of the peace in Placer county was by way of fees only. Stats. 1907, p. 498; Stats. 1909, p. 382; Stats. 1911, pp. 207, 695. At an election held on October 11, 1911, the people adopted an amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Legislature of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 2161), whereby sections 1, 5, 11, and 15 of article 6 of said instrument were changed in certain particulars. Section 15, as amended, reads as follows:

"No judicial officer, except court commissioners, shall receive to his own use any fees or perquisites of office; provided, that justices of the peace now holding office shall receive to their own use such fees as are now allowed by law during the terms for which they have been elected."

It will be observed that the operative effect of the said amendment was suspended as to the terms of the justices of the peace existing at the time of the adoption thereof; that is, section 15 as amended was not to apply to justices of the peace until after the expiration of the then existing terms of said officers or, in other words, its operation was suspended until January 1, 1915.

The Legislature of 1913 (the first session of that body after the adoption of the above amendment to the Constitution) made no provision in the county government act or otherwise for the compensation of justices of the peace of Placer county. The result was, obviously, that when the petitioner and all the other justices of the peace of said county took charge of their offices in January, 1915, there was no compensation allowed them by law in any form, and they were therefore required to perform the services demanded of them as such officers without pay or compensation. The Legislature of 1915 amended in a number of particulars the county government act in so far as it applies to counties of the thirty-first class to which Placer county belongs. Stats. 1915, p. 323. Section 13 of said act, as so amended, provides for the classification of townships in counties of the thirty-first class, according to population, for the purpose of fixing the compensation of justices of the peace of counties of said class according to their duties, and further providing that, for the purposes of such classification, the population of such townships shall be determined by the board of supervisors; such determination to be arrived at by multiplying by three the number of registered voters at the last general election next preceding the date of such determination. Id., p. 325. The section further provides:

"Justices of the peace shall receive the following salaries: In townships of the first class, the sum of $900 for the period beginning with the date upon which this act becomes effective and ending December 31, 1915, and thereafter a salary of $900 per annum. * * * Such salaries shall be paid in the same manner and out of the same fund as the salaries of county officers are paid and shall be compensation in full for all services rendered. All fees received by justices of the peace shall be paid into the county treasury every month."

The county government act of 1915 was approved by the Governor on the 3d day of May, 1915. The Legislature of that year adjourned on the 9th day of May, and hence said act, by virtue of the provision of the Constitution reserving to the people the initiative and referendum powers, did not go into effect until 90 days after the date of the adjournment of said session of the Legislature, or until the 9th day of August, 1915. Stats. 1915, pp. 1655, 1656. While the provision as to the compensation to be paid to justices, from the date upon which the act became effective until and for the remainder of the year 1915, is not involved in this controversy, since, so it is conceded by counsel, the justices of Placer county were paid and received the compensation so provided for, it is well to call special attention to that provision, inasmuch as it bears to some extent upon the question of the intention of the Legislature as to the time at which the whole provision as to the compensation of such justices should have operative or practical effect.

The ground upon which the respondent refuses to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner for the salary claimed by the latter, by virtue of the amended county government act of 1915, is that the office of justice of the peace is a county office and that the compensation provided for the incumbent of such office by the said act, as to the terms of justices of the peace of counties of the thirty-first class existing at the time of the amendment prescribing such compensation, amounts to an increase of the compensation of a county officer after his election and during his term of office, contrary to the terms of article 11, section 9, of the Constitution. The precise language of said section of the Constitution is:

"The compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office; nor shall the term of any such officer be extended beyond the period for which he is elected or appointed."

The contention of the petitioner is: (1) That he is neither a county nor city or town or municipal officer, but that the office of justice of the peace is an integral part of the judicial system of the state, as established and contemplated by the Constitution (article 6, § 11), and that since article 11, section 9, of that instrument, above quoted, or any other section or provision of that instrument, does not expressly include justices of the peace within the scope of its inhibitions, it follows that the Legislature is under no legal or constitutional interdiction so far as the increasing the compensation of justices of the peace is concerned. (2) That, conceding that justices of the peace are county officers, the provision for compensation of such officers, where, as here, no compensation whatever had theretofore been provided for as to such officers, does not involve the increase of their compensation within the meaning of the section of the Constitution above quoted herein.

We have reached the conclusion that the provision made by the Legislature of 1915 for the compensation of justices of counties of the thirty-first class (the Legislature having omitted previously to make such provision) does not involve an increase in the compensation of those officers within the contemplation of the constitutional inhibition against such increase. It will hence be unnecessary in this proceeding to consider the question whether justices of the peace are county officers and the matter of their compensation subject to the terms of the above section of the organic law. It should be explained, however, that counsel appearing here as amici curiæ represent the county of Lassen, which is of the fifty-second class, as counties have been classified by the Legislature. By the brief of counsel so appearing here, it is disclosed that one Arnold had been elected a justice of the peace of township No. 1 of Lassen county at the general state election held in the month of November, 1914, and entered upon the discharge of his duties of said office on the first Monday in January, 1915. At the time of his election, his salary as such justice, as fixed by the Legislature of 1913, was $50 per month. Stats. 1913, p. 1226. The Legislature of 1915, however, increased his compensation from $50 per month to $100 per month. Stats. 1915, pp. 1379, 1380.

Arnold, it is likewise made to appear, petitioned the superior court of Lassen county for a writ of mandate to compel the auditor of said county to draw a warrant in his (Arnold's) favor for the sum of $100 as for his salary for the month of August, 1915; his claim being that he was entitled to be paid for his services as justice according to the compensation prescribed for his office by the Legislature of 1915. The learned court below held against his contention and denied the writ, the ground of the decision being that a justice of the peace is a county officer and therefore comes within the terms of article 11, section 9, of the Constitution forbidding any act by the Legislature increasing the compensation of county officers during the terms for which they had been elected. Arnold has not initiated any proceeding authorizing a decision in his case by this court. As above stated, however, his attorney and the attorneys representing Lassen county, no doubt conceiving that the question upon the solution of which Arnold's case hinges would arise and be considered and disposed of in the present proceeding, appeared herein to present the pivotal point involved in that case; but, as before declared, we find it unnecessary, in the determination of the issue presented by this proceeding, to consider and decide that point. And, since it is deemed to be unnecessary to do so, we prefer not to consider and decide in this proceeding the question whether a justice of the peace is a county officer within the meaning of article 11, section 9, of the Constitution. The question has incidentally arisen in a number of cases decided by the Supreme Court, but that court has thus far not found it necessary to express an unqualified or a definitive judgment thereon.

The sole question, then, with which we are here concerned is, as before suggested, whether the act of providing compensation for justices of the peace in cases where the Legislature had theretofore made no provision whatever for such compensation is tantamount to "increasing" the compensation of those officers, in violation of the constitutional restriction upon the Legislature in that particular (assuming of course, for the purposes of this decision, that justices of the peace are county officers). That the Legislature intended that the compensation provided for, for the justices of the peace of counties of the thirty-first class, by the amendment made at its session of 1915 to so much of the county government act as applies to counties of that class, should be received by such justices in office at the time of the enactment of said amendment is a proposition about which there can be no kind of doubt. If the amendment were otherwise obscure or uncertain in that regard, it is certainly made very clear by the special provision authorizing the payment of the compensation so prescribed to such justices immediately upon the law going into effect; that is, beginning with the 9th day of August, 1915, and for the remainder and until the expiration of that year. Of course, the legislative intent as to an act would become wholly without importance or significance if it should transpire that, by giving effect to such intent, the act would contravene some constitutional inhibition with regard to the subject-matter thereof. For illustration (concretely): In the case of the law under consideration, although the Legislature has evinced a clear intention that the law should have operative force the moment that it went into effect, still, if, by carrying out that intention, the justices of the peace affected thereby (assuming, for the purposes of the proposition, that they fall within the inhibition of section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution) would be allowed compensation in excess of the amount which they were allowed by law when the amendment was enacted, the intention of the Legislature that said law should become operative or given practical operation immediately upon its going into effect would be violative of the constitutional mandate referred to and could not be sustained. But the provision in the amendment of the county government act for the payment of compensation to justices of the peace in Placer and other counties of the thirty-first class, from the time the amendment was to go into effect, is significant in that it clearly, and indeed unquestionably, discloses that the controlling motive underlying the amendment as a whole was to rectify the effect of an oversight by the Legislature of 1913 (the first session of that body after the adoption of section 15 of article 6 of the Constitution, whereby judicial officers are prohibited from receiving to their own use any fees, or perquisites of office, which had theretofore constituted the only source as well as mode of compensation to those officers) to make any provision for the compensation of those judicial officers of counties of the thirty-first class, with the obvious result that such officers were required, from the time of the operative effect upon them of said constitutional amendment, to render services as such officers without compensation or remuneration of any kind or character whatsoever. This having been, obviously, the sole legislative design in amending the county government act in 1915, in so far as that act applies to justices of the peace of counties of the thirty-first class, is it true that, in so attempting to correct so serious an inadvertence, the Legislature ran up against the constitutional mandate against the increasing of the compensation of certain officers after their election or during their terms of office, conceding but not deciding that justices of the peace come within the category of officers mentioned by section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution? As above declared, we do not think so.

The object which the framers of the Constitution of 1879 had in view, in incorporating into that instrument the said provision, has often been explained in the cases and is well and generally understood. In the Constitution of 1849, which was superseded by our present organic law, there was no such restriction upon the Legislature. The result was that under that instrument persons elected to county, town, and municipal offices were constantly appealing to the Legislature to increase the compensation of the offices to which they had been elected during the terms for which they had been elected. The practice grew to be a most pernicious one. In almost all instances, the legislative judgment with respect to such legislation was largely controlled, not by a consideration of whether the proposed increase of compensation was just to the taxpayers as well as to the officeholders, but by the personal influence and persistent importunity of the latter and their friends. The effect of this system was, as most naturally it would be, that certain officers of certain counties were awarded a larger amount of compensation for their services as such than were allowed to the officers of other counties performing like services, both in character and extent. It was to impart some semblance of uniformity to the compensation allowed to county and other local officers and to that end eliminate, in the consideration of legislation looking to an increase in such compensation, the element of "personal equation," which, as stated, was responsible for much of such legislation under the old system, that the constitutional barricade against such legislation was adopted into the present organic law of California.

The constitutional provision in question is founded in good sense and justice, but it cannot justly be so construed as to prevent the Legislature from supplying a manifest ellipsis in the law—to correct an obvious inadvertence whose result, if permitted to remain uncorrected, must be to hamper in no inconsiderable degree the proper administration of public affairs under a system established by the people themselves through their Constitution. There is nothing in the Constitution implying that persons performing public services shall not be compensated, and adequately compensated, therefor. On the contrary, that instrument contemplates that all public servants shall be justly compensated for their public services. The very provision in question so implies, as reasonably may it even be said of the provision which forbids the payment of judicial officers for their services as such in the form of fees required by the law to be paid to them for certain official acts. The Constitution has, save in an exceptional instance or two, committed to the Legislature the duty of making provision for such compensation, and, where that body fails wholly to do its duty in that regard, it must be assumed that the omission has been due entirely to an oversight or inadvertence. To hold it to be true, then, that in such a case an act, whose purpose is merely to correct the inadvertence and so provide for compensation—provide for something which theretofore had not existed—amounts to an "increase" of compensation within the import of the constitutional provision in question would be to give to that provision a most unreasonable construction or a construction from which most unjust consequences would follow, where the Legislature had failed to do its duty in that regard. But the provision referred to cannot in reason be given such a construction. Indeed, such a construction would amount to a palpable solecism in logic. It would give to the word "increase" a signification opposed to what it naturally implies, for the act of "increasing" anything necessarily presupposes the existence in some measure or to some extent of something which may be enlarged. In other words, to effect an increase is to add something to or enlarge something already in existence; or, as Webster's Dictionary defines the word "increase," it is "that which is added to the original stock by augmentation or growth—to extend or enlarge in size, extent, quantity, number, intensity, value, substance," etc. It would be no less absurd to attempt to conceive a process by which something may be added to nothing than it would be to attempt to conceive the subtraction of something from nothing. If a person owning no money or other kind of property suddenly becomes the owner of property or money, his wealth has not thereby been "increased" within the lexicology or signification of that word. He has simply acquired something which previously he did not have.

The foregoing view of the constitutional provision under consideration coincides with that expressed in characteristically clear and forceful language in a dissenting opinion by the late learned Justice McFarland in the case of Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 69, 78, 82 Pac. 674, in which a similar constitutional provision, applicable, however, to the justices of the Supreme and appellate courts, was considered. Among other things, he said:

"* * * As to the salaries of the judges of the new superior courts, its provision is that 'until otherwise changed by the Legislature the superior court judges shall receive an annual salary of $3,000 each.' But the provision as to salaries of justices of the Supreme Court is materially different. It is that 'during the term of the first judges elected under this Constitution the annual salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court shall be $6,000 each'; it does not provide that such salaries shall continue until otherwise provided by the Legislature. It does not provide at all for salaries of justices who shall be elected after the first term. It leaves that for the Legislature, whose duty it was to provide for the salaries of said future justices. The Legislature, however, neglected that duty until March 18, 1905. And when, at the last-named date, the Legislature did perform that duty by fixing the salary at $8,000, the salary was not thereby 'increased.' It simply for the first time fixed the salary, not by increasing an existing salary, for there was none, but by remedying the former neglect to fix any salary at all. The fact that, from the time when the provision of the Constitution as to the salaries of the first justices ceased, the state, without any law on the subject, paid the justices certain compensation does not in any way affect the validity of the above views."

While the court, in the main opinion, did not accept the reasoning of Justice McFarland, there is nothing said in the majority opinion in that case which conflicts with the view expressed by the dissenting justice as to the point here under consideration.

We conclude that the petitioner is entitled to the compensation prescribed for his office by the law of 1915, and the demurrer to the petition herein is overruled, and, accordingly, a writ of mandate will issue out of this court, requiring the respondent to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner for the salary of said petitioner, as prayed for herein.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; ELLISON, J. pro tem.

2. BAIL $\Leftrightarrow$ 47—BAIL IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—BAIL ON APPEAL—STATUTE.

By Pen. Code, § 1291, the authority to admit to bail, in cases in which accused may be admitted to bail on appeal, is vested in any magistrate having the power to issue a writ of habeas corpus, or by the magistrate before whom the trial was had.

3. BAIL $\Leftrightarrow$ 44, 47—BAIL IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—BAIL AFTER CONVICTION—APPLICATION.

Application for bail after conviction and pending the determination of an appeal should be made in the first instance before the judge who tried the cause, and should not be granted except where circumstances of an extraordinary character have intervened since conviction, making the step obviously proper.

4. BAIL $\Leftrightarrow$ 44—BAIL IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—BAIL PENDING APPEAL—AFFLICTION WITH EPILEPSY.

Where a party convicted of embezzling public funds made uncontradicted showing to the trial court, on application for habeas corpus to obtain an order admitting him to bail pending determination of his appeal, that he was af-licted with grand mal epilepsy, and that he was confined in a cell four by seven so that he was likely to injure himself during a seizure, of which he had had several since his confinement, the trial court abused his discretion by refusing to admit to bail, though the prisoner's brother was permitted to remain with him during the night, and a deputy sheriff occupied quarters near petitioner's cell in the daytime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. § 145; Dec. Dig. ¶44.]

In the matter of the application of C. F. Preciado for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain an order admitting him to bail pending the determination of his appeal from a conviction of the crime of embezzling public funds. Petitioner admitted to bail upon giving an undertaking as required by law.

L. D. Windrem, of Pt. Richmond, R. R. Fowler, of Turlock, and H. J. Maxim and Jos. Barcroft, both of Madera, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Stanley Murray, Dist. Atty., of Madera, for respondent.

HART, J. The petitioner was convicted in the superior court of Madera county, on the 13th day of March, 1916, of the crime of embezzling public funds; he being at the time of the alleged commission of said offense tax collector of said county. Upon his conviction by the jury, he was remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Madera county and by that official incarcerated in the county jail of said county, wherein he is now and ever since his conviction has been confined. He has taken an appeal to the appellate court from the judgment of conviction, and has inaugurated this proceeding for the purpose of obtaining an order admitting him to bail pending the determination of said appeal. The writ was made returnable before and heard by two of the justices of this court.

The petition alleges that, upon the conviction of the petitioner, and before his commitment, "application was made to the Honorable C. O. Busick, trial judge, in behalf of your petitioner for bail, pending appeal to be taken, which said motion was denied upon the ground that no adequate showing had been made for admission to bail; that your petitioner, upon the date set for his sentence, to wit, on Saturday, the 18th day of March, 1916, gave due and legal notice of appeal from the judgment of said court, which said appeal is now pending and in process of perfection, and at the same time and place another motion was made in behalf of your petitioner for admission to bail pending his said appeal, which said motion was by said trial judge denied."

The petitioner is, according to the petition and the proofs, a chronic epileptic, having suffered from epilepsy for a period of over eight years, and being "subject to frequent violent attacks of the 'grand mal' form of said malady." It is alleged in the petition that the cell in which he is confined "is of metal, about four by seven feet in size, fitted with a hammock, an iron washstand and an iron toilet bowl; that the floor, ceiling, and walls of said cell are of steel; that the corridor upon which said cell opens is built of steel in its entirety; that since the date of your petitioner's confinement he has been seized with grand mal attacks six times."

It is further alleged:

"That since Tuesday, April 11, 1916, your petitioner has been confined in his cell alone during the daytime, a brother remaining with him at night, by and with the consent of the sheriff; that, up to the present time, there has been some other person present during seizures, but, as there are no other person or persons confined with your petitioner at this time, your petitioner fears that subsequent seizures will result in grievous injury, and perhaps death; that his continued confinement in his present quarters is fraught with serious impending danger to his life; and that his continued confinement pending his appeal is likely to result fatally."

The application for bail to the court below was based upon the uncontroverted affidavits filed by the petitioner. Some of these affidavits were by physicians who therein stated that the petitioner is and has been for a number of years subject to epileptic fits, and that the attacks were of the character known in medical science as the grand mal type, which is pronounced by experts in that science to be the most serious form in which that malady manifests itself. Other affidavits are by persons who personally witnessed and described a number of these attacks suffered by the petitioner since his incarceration in jail.

The same affidavits have been filed with the petition before us. In addition to these, there have been filed here, in behalf of the petitioner, the affidavits of J. J. Cramer, night jailer at the Madera county jail, and Henry and W. B. Preciado, brothers of the petitioner, and, by way of a counter showing by the respondent, the affidavits of Drs. T. M. Hayden and C. P. H. Kjaerbye, and those of the district attorney of Madera county and J. F. Lewis, sheriff of said county.

It is conceded that the petitioner is an epileptic, that he suffers from intermittent attacks of that disease, and that the paroxysms are very severe or of the most serious form of that malady. It is stated in the affidavits upon which the application was made for bail before the court below and which affidavits as seen, are among those upon which this application is made, that the petitioner has suffered six epileptic attacks since his confinement. The statement that he has had a number of attacks since his confinement was not denied before the trial judge, nor is it controverted here. On the contrary, it is conceded to be true.

The affidavits used in the application to the trial judge for bail disclosed, as here, that W. B. Preciado, a brother of petitioner, found it necessary, because of the condition of petitioner as alleged and described, that the latter should have some one with him in the county jail at all times to prevent injury resulting to him when seized with an epileptic fit, and that, by permission of the sheriff, he (W. B. Preciado) has remained with the petitioner during the nighttime since the latter's confinement.

The affidavits of the physicians filed in behalf of the petitioner declare that it is the professional opinion of each of the affiants that "confinement in jail is greatly injurious to his (petitioner's) health and endangers his life."

The additional proof presented on this hearing in behalf of the petitioner shows that the latter has suffered two epileptic attacks since the date of the application to the trial judge for an order admitting him to bail—one occurring on April 14th and the other on April 16th.

The two doctors whose affidavits were filed here by the respondent each states that he made a professional examination of the petitioner on the 21st day of April, 1916; that from such examination, he found petitioner to be "in good normal condition"; and "that his body was well nourished, his skin was clear, his urine normal, his eyes bright and temperature normal; that his pulse was 65, his lungs and heart normal, his tendon reflex normal; and that according to the statement of the said C. F. Preciado (petitioner) his appetite was good; * * * that he was in a cheerful state of mind, talked intelligently about his case; that he suffered, or seemed to suffer, no more from his confinement than the ordinary average prisoner suffers or seems to suffer from confinement." These affiants further state that they have been informed by the sheriff, his deputies, and the petitioner himself that the latter, since his incarceration, has had but four attacks or fits; that he has been confined in jail for five weeks; and "that this number of attacks during this period of time is a decrease in number from the number he has suffered according to the testimony introduced at the trial of the said C. F. Preciado during the period of eight or nine years immediately before his confinement in the county jail," etc., and that "the said C. F. Preciado, due to his incarceration in the said jail, is not in imminent danger of death."

The sheriff, in his affidavit, deposes:

That the petitioner, "during the whole of the period during which he has been confined, has eaten heartily, slept well, appeared to be in jovial spirits, and has complained of no sickness or pain; that affiant has seen petitioner in one convulsion or spasm since his confinement which lasted from three to four minutes; that affiant has been informed by his deputies that petitioner has had but three other spasms or convulsions during the period of his confinement, the same in each instance lasting no longer than four minutes; and that he comes out of these attacks without any noticeable effects upon his health or general condition."

The sheriff further deposes:

"That a deputy sheriff has his desk within about 18 feet of his cell door; that at least every half hour during each and every day a deputy sheriff is within sight of the said C. F. Preciado; that by reason of the close contact of deputies in the office with the said C. F. Preciado's cell it would be impossible for any commotion to occur therein without some one observing same and going immediately to his rescue; that during the nighttime affiant has permitted the brother or some other member of the said C. F. Preciado's family to occupy a cot placed directly in front of the open cell door of the said C. F. Preciado; that affiant has extended this privilege, not by reason of any fear of injury to the said C. F. Preciado, but out of courtesy to the defendant and to the members of his family; that at night a deputy sheriff also sleeps in a room off of the corridor and within 20 feet of the cell of the said C. F. Preciado; that affiant does not believe that his incarceration at the jail at this time affects the health or physical condition of the said C. F. Preciado in any wise, or that the said C. F. Preciado is in any danger whatsoever by reason of his incarceration aforesaid."

The district attorney deposes that the trial of the petitioner covered a period of about three weeks, during which time (so that official declares upon information and belief) the petitioner suffered no epileptic attack; that (upon information and belief) the petitioner has had only four attacks during his confinement in jail; and likewise states that said attacks have not been of a severe character and have lasted not to exceed in any case four minutes, etc.

The foregoing embraces a statement, in substance, of the showing made both in the court below and here.

[1, 2] By the terms of section 1272 of the Penal Code, whether a person after having been convicted of a felony, not involving the death penalty, may be admitted to bail, is a matter resting wholly in the discretion of the trial court before which the conviction was obtained. Under section 1291 of said Code, the authority to admit to bail, in cases in which the accused may be admitted to bail on appeal, is vested in any magistrate having the power to issue the writ of habeas corpus, or by the magistrate before whom the trial was had.

[3] The settled rule in this state as to the matter of the application for bail after conviction and pending the determination of an appeal is that such application should be made in the first instance before the judge who tried the cause. People v. January, 70 Cal. 34, 11 Pac. 326; People v. Perdue, 48 Cal. 552; Ex parte Turner, 112 Cal. 629, 45 Pac. 571; Ex parte Hatch, 15 Cal. App. 186, 114 Pac. 410; Matter of Application of Cornell, 153 Pac. 726, 727. It has, accordingly, been declared that:

"The discretion given in cases of this kind is vested primarily in the court that tried the cause, or the judge thereof, * * * and the determination of the latter should not be disturbed or ignored except in an instance of manifest abuse." Ex parte Turner, supra; People v. Perdue, supra; People v. January, supra.

Those cases further say that, since bail after conviction is purely a matter of judicial discretion, such discretion should not be exercised in favor of the liberation of a defendant pending appeal, "except in instances where circumstances of an extraordinary character have intervened since conviction, which makes it obviously proper."

In this case, as seen, there was no adversary showing attempted by the respondent before the trial judge. In the proceeding here, as has been shown, there is such an attempt, but, as we shall endeavor to show, the effect of the showing so attempted is not to raise a conflict in the proofs upon the vital question of fact involved herein. In other words, we are not of the opinion that the affidavits filed herein in opposition to those filed by the petitioner in any measure impeach or detract from the force of the showing made by the petitioner in the court below. The important question, then, to which we are required to address ourselves, is whether or not the action of the trial judge, in declining to make an order admitting the petitioner to bail pending the determination of his cause on appeal, involved an abuse of discretion, or (in other language) whether the proofs adduced before us without conflict disclose that this is a case where circumstances of an extraordinary character have intervened since conviction, which makes an order admitting the petitioner to bail obviously proper, and that therefore the judge of the court below should have exercised his discretion favorably to the application of the petitioner for bail.

In determining this application, we have the right to consider the nature and characteristics of the malady from which the petitioner is shown to be a chronic sufferer. According to Dr. Spratling, a noted and accepted authority on epilepsy, that malady is defined as follows:

"A disease or disorder affecting the brain, characterized by recurrent paroxysms which are abrupt in appearance, variable in duration but generally short, and in which there is impairment or loss of consciousness, together with impairment of motor co-ordination, with or without convulsions."

The same author tells us that there is a variety of forms of epilepsy, the more prominent and serious of which are the grand mal and the petit mal types. The petitioner's malady, as will be recalled, has been diagnosed as of the grand mal or severer form of the disease. In the attacks of this form of the disease, which are always sudden and unexpected, so far as is concerned the particular time at which the seizures may occur, the body of the victim becomes rigid, his eyes are set and characterized by a stare, his face takes on a deadly pallor, his hands alternately clutch and open, his body jerks, trembles, and twitches convulsively, he has frothings at the mouth, and he loses consciousness. When under such an attack, if then standing, his body will naturally and of course lurch and fall to the floor. If lying down when the attack is on, it is not impossible and often happens, from the convulsive movements of the body, that the patient will fall from the couch or bed upon which he is lying.

Epilepsy is not wholly an incurable malady, and while there is, of course, always danger of a sudden fatal termination of the disease through a single, brief attack, there is still the added danger of death following from a single attack, not from the attack itself, but, when alone or unattended by any one, from a serious injury suffered by the victim from falling and striking some hard substance, as, for instance, sustaining in the fall a fractured skull; or, if unattended by some one capable of affording him immediate assistance, he might die from suffocation.

Thus it will be perceived that, while it may be very true, as the doctors giving testimony here for the respondent declare, that the petitioner is not in imminent danger of death from the disease itself, the important fact nevertheless stands out that, the petitioner having suffered several attacks since his incarceration, there is a strong probability of a recurrence of them, and that, when having such an attack, in the absence of an attendant able to give him proper or the necessary protection and attention, he is in great danger of falling and thus striking the floor or some other solid substance with a very serious, if not fatal, result, or, being unattended and without proper and timely assistance, he might, in one of those paroxysms, die from suffocation. Spratling on Epilepsy, p. 304. Thus the necessity of constant special care and attention at the hands of some one capable of administering such care and attention is plainly manifest. That he cannot receive such care and attention under the unfortunate circumstances by which he is now beset is obvious, and it necessarily follows that he is at all times under imminent danger of receiving injuries from which his death might ensue.

Neither the fact that a brother of the petitioner has been permitted to remain with him during the nighttime of each day, nor the fact that a deputy sheriff occupies quarters in the jail within 20 feet of the cell occupied by the petitioner, where he (the deputy) can readily and distinctly hear the noise or commotion usually accompanying or resulting from the attacks from which the petitioner suffers, relieves the situation or answers the proposition that the life of the petitioner is in jeopardy and will so remain so long as the petitioner is circumstanced as he now is. The ministrations of the brother of the petitioner are, of course, prompted by considerations of brotherly sympathy and affection, but they are purely voluntary, and his presence in jail a matter of license or privilege. Neither he nor any other person should be required to undergo self-imposed imprisonment, however laudable may be the purpose or the motive of such a sacrifice. The law does not contemplate or require it. As to the fact that a deputy sheriff occupies quarters in close proximity to the petitioner's cell and thus is enabled to hear any noise proceeding from said cell, the obvious reply is that the very "noise" or "commotion" which the officer declares would readily attract his attention might be the effect of the very thing to be guarded against—injury to the petitioner from a fall while under the influence of an epileptic attack.

[4] Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, we are convinced that the petitioner, suffering as he was and is from the most serious form of a disease which is dangerous to life not alone in and of itself but also because of the external consequences of the malady, should at all times be attended by some person competent to protect and assist him when, by reason of the recurrent violent manifestations of the disease, he is wholly powerless to protect or assist himself, and, moreover, should be afforded a better opportunity than his present circumstances will permit to receive special treatment at the hands of a specialist in diseases of the character of that with which he is afflicted.

We are therefore constrained to the conclusion that the circumstances of this case, as developed by the record in the proceeding for bail before the court below, are of such a character as to have called for the exercise of the discretion vested in the trial court or judge in such matters favorably to the application for bail, and that the learned trial judge in a legal view abused that discretion by refusing to make the order; and, since, as we have above pointed out, the showing before us is, substantially, the same as that made before the trial judge, notwithstanding the purported adversary showing herein by the respondent, which showing was not made before the trial judge, there is nothing herein to preclude us from resting our decision upon the determination of the question whether the trial judge did so abuse his discretion.

In accordance with the foregoing views, it is ordered that the petitioner be and he is hereby admitted to bail pending the determination of his appeal from the judgment of his conviction of the crime of embezzlement, upon giving an undertaking as required by law in such cases in the sum of $10,000; said undertaking to be approved by the judge of the superior court of the county of Madera.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

E. L. Wilkison was convicted of burning property, and appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. M. McHargue and Frank T. Bates, both of San Bernardino, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was charged with having set fire to a pile of baled hay which was owned by a corporation. His conviction followed, after which a motion for a new trial was made. The appeal is taken from a judgment of imprisonment and also from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

The section under which defendant was prosecuted provides in part as follows (section 600, Pen. Code):

"Every person who willfully and maliciously burns any * * * stack of hay or grain or straw of any kind, or any pile of baled hay or straw, * * * not the property of such person, is punishable. * * *"

One Warrick, who it is claimed participated with the defendant in the commission of the offense, testified at the trial. He testified that on the day preceding the night when the burning occurred he and the defendant had been drinking liquor, and that by the time evening came both of them were considerably intoxicated; that this defendant proposed that they burn the pile of hay, which belonged to the Chino Land & Water Company, saying that he (the defendant) had a grudge against that company because they had "beaten him out of some money" at a time previous; that the two went to the hay pile; that each of them lighted a match and set fire to the hay; that on their return they stopped at the house of one Andrews, and there statements were made as to what they had been doing, and that the defendant repeated to Andrews his statement that he had a grudge against the corporation mentioned; that they then proceeded to other places, barns, etc., and set some four or five more fires that night. Andrews testified in corroboration of the statement made by Warrick as to the conversation had at his house, and as to the statement made by the defendant that they had set fire to the hay because defendant had a grudge against the Chino corporation. Another witness, an officer, testified to the fact that he found the hay burning, and that there was no other fire about the stack, which he said was located some 200 yards away from the railroad track; that the stack was in an open field. This witness also testified that he knew the hay to be that of the Chino Land & Water Company because he had known of its being hauled there for that company, and that he just had negotiations with the company's manager for the purchase of some of the hay. The peace officer testified that at the time he arrested this defendant he found him at his mother's place in Chino, and that the defendant made certain statements to him without any promise of reward or any threat being made or any inducement of any kind being held out to him. This officer testified that the defendant said "he and Warrick started the fire." The question was then asked the witness:

"What fires were you talking of to him when he made the statement? A. The Chino Land & Water Company's hay pile and Mr. Newman's barn and Mr. Snyder's place and Mr. Bickmore's place and Mr. Eckhart's place."

This officer on cross-examination said that he asked the defendant what he knew about the fires in Chino, and that the defendant replied, "I don't know anything about them." The witness then said:

"That was his first statement, and I looked at him and I saw his hands and limbs all atremble; his hands and limbs were all shaky; and he said, 'I will come out and tell you the truth about it,' and I said, 'It is always best to tell the truth,' and then he told me him and Warrick set the fires."

It is insisted that the testimony of the alleged confession of the defendant was improperly admitted over the objection on the ground that the same was not voluntary.

[1] The officer stated that he made no promises nor threats to induce the statement, and his testimony, both direct examination and cross-examination, discloses no improper influence having been brought to bear to produce the incriminating admission. The mere statement of the officer, after the defendant's declaration that he would come out and tell the truth, that it was always best to tell the truth, cannot be classed as having an improper influence for the reason that the defendant, according to the officer's testimony, had already made up his mind to declare the truth.

[2] It is further claimed that there was no sufficient proof of the corpus delicti, except as it was furnished by the words of the accomplice, Warrick. The corpus delicti may always be shown by proof of circumstances. The officer who found the hay burning and described to the jury the conditions as he discovered them and gave a description of the character of the pile of hay, together with its situation in an open lot, furnished ample evidence from which the jury could properly conclude that the fire was of incendiary origin. The testimony of his accomplice, together with the express admission of the defendant, furnished abundant proof upon which to base a verdict of guilty. The defendant testified as a witness on his own behalf, and, while he denied active participation in the setting of the fire, admitted that he went to the pile of hay with Warrick. He admitted further being present at Andrews' house, but sought to shift the responsibility for the remark as to the grudge against the Shino Company from himself to Warrick. A case was so plainly made out against the defendant upon the whole testimony, as we view it, that it would be almost inconceivable that the jury could have decided otherwise upon the proof presented. That consideration will be borne in mind when certain other objections urged by the appellant are considered.

[3, 4] It appears that two trials were had of this defendant. The information in the first case charged that he burned a "stack of hay." At the conclusion of the testimony, it having been shown that the hay burned was a pile of baled hay, the court directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant on the ground of variance between the charge and the proof. The defendant had asked that the case be dismissed on the same ground. The second information was then filed, upon which this trial was had, wherein the defendant was charged with having burned "a pile of baled hay." To this second charge, in addition to his plea of not guilty, defendant interposed a plea of once in jeopardy and of former acquittal, basing both pleas upon evidence of the acquittal made because of the variance mentioned. The jury in the case was advised by the court that it should find for the people on the plea of once in jeopardy, but no verdict was returned on the plea of former acquittal. Appellant insists here that, not only was the court in error in directing the jury to find for the people on the plea of former jeopardy, but that he was entitled to a verdict on the plea of former acquittal, and that no jurisdiction resided in the court to pronounce judgment until such a verdict had been rendered. It should be remembered that the evidence offered in support of the plea of once in jeopardy and that of former acquittal was the same, to wit, the record of the proceedings had in the first trial. While it is true in general that a plea of once in jeopardy presents a question of fact which the jury has the right to solve, where the evidence is uncontradicted and shows a state of the case such as that disclosed here, the question becomes more particularly one of law upon which the court is authorized to advise the jury directly. People v. Cummings, 123 Cal. 269, 55 Pac. 898; People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 50 Pac. 15. And we think that, where the jury made its finding upon a plea of not guilty and once in jeopardy, the judgment is not rendered invalid because of the failure to find particularly upon the plea of former acquittal. As has been mentioned, precisely the same facts were relied upon to support the latter plea as were relied upon to sustain the plea of jeopardy. If the defendant had been formerly acquitted, he would also have been in jeopardy. The finding of the jury under the facts here disclosed upon the plea of once in jeopardy necessarily included an adverse finding upon the plea of previous acquittal.

[5] The defendant has complained that the court had no right in the first trial to give a mandatory instruction directing his acquittal, but the sole argument in support of this objection seems to be that the court should have advised but not "directed" such a verdict. We think that the defendant is not in a position to raise this objection, as the action of the court was favorable to him, rather than the contrary. The fact that he was at that time insisting upon his motion to dismiss the case does not, we think, add any force to the position which he now takes regarding that matter. Cases have been reversed where the appeal was taken by the people from an instruction directing a verdict, but we have yet to find one where the defendant has claimed to have suffered prejudice for like cause. The court under the state of the case at the first trial was altogether justified in refusing to dismiss the charge and would have been justified in refusing to "advise" the jury to acquit without it appearing that such acquittal was by reason of the variance between the proof and the charge, which acquittal, under section 1021 of the Penal Code, constitutes no bar to a further prosecution.

[6] The court in instructing the jury stated the definition of the word "malice" as the same is found in subdivision 4 of section 7 of the Penal Code, as follows:

"The words 'malice' and 'maliciously' import a wish to vex, annoy, or injure another person, or an intent to do a wrongful act, established either by proof or presumption of law."

The court gave a further instruction to the jury in which the jury was advised that it was necessary for the prosecution to prove malice, as it was one of the material elements of the offense, and stated:

"And, in this connection, you are instructed that malice is not presumed, and you cannot presume that any act of the defendant was malicious, but the malice on the part of the defendant must be established by the prosecution as one of the material elements of the offense, and you must be satisfied that the acts of the defendant were malicious to the same extent that you must be satisfied with any other material element of this offense."

The appellant insists that the malice mentioned in section 600 of the Penal Code is a particular malice which becomes as of the intent with which the crime is committed, and is not such malice as is defined by subdivision 4 of section 7 above quoted. The Code definition of malice is applicable in all cases where the word "malicious" is used in the Code as the part of the definition of an offense. It is only in cases where in the description of the offense some qualification is made as to the meaning of that term or as to the proof thereof that a defendant has a right to further instruction upon that subject. We find in the case of People v. Dice, 120 Cal. 189, 52 Pac. 477, where the charge was murder, that the Supreme Court sustained the giving of an instruction which declared the definition of malice in the terms first stated above. In that case the further instruction was given as to express and implied malice agreeable to the special provisions of the section which immediately follows that defining the crime of murder. See, also, People v. Taylor, 36 Cal. 255; People v. Myring, 144 Cal. 351, 77 Pac. 975; People v. Ah Toon, 68 Cal. 362, 9 Pac. 311; Davis v. Pacific Telephone, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 312, 57 Pac. 764, 59 Pac. 698.

[7] It is further claimed that the court erred in allowing proof to be made of the fact that a number of fires were set by Warrick and the defendant after the pile of baled hay was kindled and on the same night. Conceding that proof of after-committed offenses is not admissible in support of a criminal charge, we feel wholly justified in this case in resolving the error against the defendant for the reason that upon the whole case we think that the conviction was just and that there has been no miscarriage of justice. The chief points relied upon by the appellant have now been considered. The instructions of the court were quite complete and seem to have fully stated the law applicable to the case. The judgment and order are affirmed.

Where mortgagor of crop, under agreement with mortgagee, removed crops from land and delivered them to defendant for sale in name of mortgagee, held, he was acting as agent of mortgagee, and, notwithstanding that, contrary to instructions, he delivered crops in his own name instead of that of the mortgagee, the mortgagee's lien was not lost under Civ. 2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES ⇨147—CROP MORTGAGES—REMOVAL OF CROPS—LOSS OF LIEN.

Where defendant made advances to crop mortgagor during the time the crops remained on the land, he was charged with notice of the crop mortgage, and the subsequent delivery of crops to him by the mortgagor did not make the claim for such advances preferential to the mortgage lien.

4. CHATTEL MORTGAGES ⇨227—CROP MORTGAGES—REMOVAL OF CROPS—LOSS OF LIEN.

The consignee, to whom mortgaged crops were wrongfully delivered by the mortgagor who removed them from the land, has no right to the proceeds thereof as against the mortgagee, unless he be an innocent purchaser for value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by A. C. Crosby against the Fresno Fruit Growers' Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for appellant. G. L. Aynesworth, of Fresno, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. On September 30, 1912, A. H. Weyant, according to the allegations of the complaint, was indebted to A. C. Crosby, the plaintiff, in the sum of $1,000, evidenced by promissory notes secured by a mortgage on a certain crop of grapes in Fresno county, which mortgage was duly recorded. On the 17th day of April, 1913, Weyant entered into a consignment contract in writing by the terms of which he "assigned, transferred, and agreed to deliver" to the defendant this crop of grapes. Under said contract the defendant was to pack and sell the grapes through the California Fruit Exchange, and after deducting certain enumerated expenses and a commission of 7 per cent. on the gross sales the proceeds were to be paid to Weyant. On June 26, 1913, Weyant assigned all his interest in the said contract to S. L. Weyant, his wife, receiving on account thereof $200. Weyant at once gave defendant notice of the assignment to his wife, and the account concerning the grapes when later delivered was kept by the defendant in her name. Prior to the delivery of the grapes, which was in August, and shortly after the assignment of Weyant's interest in the consignment contract to his wife, he, his wife, and Crosby had an oral understanding that, in order to protect the Crosby mortgage, the grapes should be shipped and delivered to the defendant in Crosby's name, and the proceeds from the sale thereof should be paid to Crosby and applied by him on account of the payment of the Crosby mortgage. In due time the crop of grapes was delivered by Weyant to the defendant, without, however, stating that he was delivering them for Crosby's account, and he left the defendant under the impression that the delivery was made under the terms of the existing contract of consignment and the assignment thereof to his wife.

The net proceeds due from the sale of the grapes by defendant were the sum of $789.69, which plaintiff claims he is entitled to by virtue of the provisions of the crop mortgage and the delivery thereof to the defendant by Weyant as his agent. Defendant, on the other hand, claims that it is entitled to part of the proceeds of the sale of the grapes because of moneys paid to and on account of Weyant at the time of entering into the contract of consignment and subsequently, and which it was agreed between defendant and Weyant should be reimbursed to defendant out of the net proceeds of the sale of the grapes when consigned and sold, and as to the balance of the proceeds the defendant asserts that it held the same subject to certain attachment proceedings in actions pending against Weyant.

The court found in favor of the plaintiff as to the execution of the mortgage, that the defendant had notice of it, and that the delivery of the grapes to the defendant was for and on account of plaintiff, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for $789.69, the amount of the net returns on the crop of grapes. The defendant's motion for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying such motion.

The principal points made by the appellant for reversal are that under section 2972 of the Civil Code the plaintiff's mortgage lien on the crop was lost by the removal of the crop from the land, and that there was no proof made in the trial court of the execution or existence of the mortgage or of the amount, if any, due thereunder to the plaintiff.

Section 2972 of the Civil Code is in the following terms:

"The lien of a mortgage on a growing crop continues on the crop after severance, whether remaining in its original state or converted into another product, so long as the same remains on the land of the mortgagor."

The question has heretofore arisen whether the removal of the crop by the mortgagee is such a removal as will destroy the lien, and it has been held that it is not. The reason for the rule thus announced probably is that the mortgagee, having taken possession of the crop for the purpose of enforcing his rights, is in the same position as the pledgee of personal property in possession of the pledge, and his lien on the property is of exactly the same quality and nature. In the case of Campodonico v. Oregon Improvement Co., 87 Cal. 566, 25 Pac. 763, the question was whether or not there had been such a removal of the mortgaged property as to destroy the lien. There one Dodge had duly mortgaged growing beans and barley to the plaintiff to secure payment of a certain sum of money, which mortgage was recorded. Thereupon Dodge, at the request of plaintiff, the mortgagee, had the property hauled from the land on which it was grown and delivered to the defendant at its warehouse, instructing the person hauling it to store the property in the name of the plaintiff. The receipts for the property, however, notwithstanding the efforts of Dodge to have them issued in the name of the plaintiff, were issued in Dodge's name. The plaintiff did not know of this until October 28, 1888, when he was informed of that fact, and of the further fact that the property had been attached the day before. In upholding the judgment of the lower court in plaintiff's favor the court said:

"The lien of respondent's mortgage was not lost by his permitting the mortgagor, Dodge, to haul the mortgaged property from the land on which it was grown, and its storage in defendant's warehouse, under the circumstances disclosed in the findings. Byrnes v. Hatch, 77 Cal. 241, 244 [19 Pac. 482]. The neglect or refusal of the defendant's agent to issue a receipt showing that the property was stored in the warehouse for the plaintiff did not change the effect of the agreement, made between plaintiff and his mortgagor, Dodge, as to the way in which it should be stored, so as to destroy the mortgage lien in favor of the assignee of the insolvent, Dodge."

In Byrnes v. Hatch, 77 Cal. 241, 19 Pac. 482, a crop of hay was hauled to a warehouse by the mortgagor at the request of and as the agent of the mortgagee, who had taken a chattel mortgage on the growing crop. In this situation the court said:

"It seems that the lien of the mortgagee on the crop is not lost."

[1, 2] In the case at bar the agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee that the former should deliver the crop to the defendant in the name of the mortgagee must, when the crop is removed under such agreement and the delivery made, be held to constitute the mortgagor the agent of the mortgagee in such delivery, even though such agent violates his instructions and delivers the crop in his own name. No question here arises of advances made by the consignee to the agent upon the security of the crop after its delivery, in which event other legal principles might find their just application, and estop the mortgagee from insisting upon his rights as against the consignee. Here the advances made by the consignee were made during the time that the crop was still upon the land, and when the consignee was charged with notice of the mortgagee's rights. The consignee will not be permitted to take advantage of the wrong committed by the mortgagee's agent from which it has not suffered.

[3, 4] In what we have said it is assumed that the removal of the crop from the land was under the agreement with the mortgagee, and that the only wrongful act of the mortgagor was in the violation of his further agreement with the mortgagee that the crop should be delivered to the defendant in the mortgagee's name. But, on the other hand, if Weyant, in removing the crop from the land, purported to do so on his own account, still the defendant is in no better case; for such removal was also wrongful, and Weyant could not take advantage of his wrongful act, and his consignee, being a mere agent, is in the same position, unless he can clothe himself with the character of innocent purchaser for value. This, we have seen, the defendant has not done. In the cases of Wilson v. Prouty, 70 Cal. 197, 11 Pac. 608, and Martin v. Thompson, 63 Cal. 3, it was held that the tortious removal of the crop by a third person does not destroy the lien of an existing chattel mortgage thereon, and this principle is evidently applicable to a tortious removal by the mortgagor himself.

For the foregoing reasons we hold that under the facts found in this case the net proceeds of the sale of the crop are applicable to the payment of the debt due the mortgagee, and that, if all these findings were supported by the evidence, the conclusion of the court that the defendant dealt with the crop with notice of and in subordination to the plaintiff's mortgage would have been correct.

[5] The next point made in support of the appeal is that there is no evidence in the record to sustain the finding of the court that Weyant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000 evidenced by a promissory note, and to secure payment of which he executed, acknowledged, and delivered to the plaintiff the mortgage in question, and that no payment had been made on account of such indebtedness.

The position of the respondent in answer to this contention is that the allegations of the complaint bearing upon these matters were denied only upon information and belief, and that such denials were insufficient to raise an issue thereon. The trial court apparently adopted this view. In this we think the court erred. While the defendant could not deny on information and belief the recordation of the mortgage, it could so deny its execution and the existence of the debt. The defendant was not a party to the mortgage; and, while receiving constructive notice of its contents through its recordation, it was still entitled to put the plaintiff to proof of its due execution, and did so by a denial based on lack of information and belief—the only form of denial it was possible for it to make.

Speaking of the right of a defendant to deny an allegation upon information and belief, Mr. Bliss, in his work on Code Pleading (section 326), says:

"The obligation to verify the pleading implies an obligation to state the truth; hence the permission to deny any knowledge or information, etc., is not absolute. If the fact charged is evidently within the defendant's knowledge—as an act done by himself and within the period of recollection, or where he has the means of information—a denial of information in the language of the statute would be clearly false or evasive, and such an answer should be disregarded."

Applying the principle as thus stated by Mr. Bliss to the present case, the fact charged, viz., the execution of the note and mortgage, was not within the defendant's knowledge; it was not a party to it and had no means of information. An examination of the record would disclose nothing but the purported execution of the mortgage and the purported existence of an indebtedness secured thereby. In the case of Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Cal. 59, 62, 70 Am. Dec. 621, the rule is thus laid down:

"When the alleged fact is, from its nature, presumptively within the personal knowledge of the defendant, he cannot be permitted to answer upon information and belief, but must answer in the form positive. And where, from the nature of the fact alleged, the knowledge, if any, of the defendant is presumptively based upon information, he is not bound to deny positively, but only 'according to his information and belief.' In this case the transfer from Cooper was the act of a third party; and, unless it had been expressly alleged in the complaint that defendants knew that fact of their own knowledge, they could only be required to answer according to information and belief."

None of the cases cited by the respondent go to the extent claimed by him. In Le Breton v. Stanley, 15 Cal. App. 429, 433, 114 Pac. 1028, the facts denied for want of information and belief were an adjudication in insolvency and the appointment of a receiver—a case in which the records themselves proved the existence of the facts alleged. And so in Mendocino County v. Peters, 2 Cal. App. 24, 28, 82 Pac. 1122, where the facts denied were public records, such as the report of the viewers in a condemnation proceeding for a public road, the notice of hearing and various orders of the board of supervisors. In Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 35 Pac. 144 (which the respondent in his brief characterizes as his best case), it was the record of a claim of lien; and in Hewel v. Hogin, 3 Cal. App. 248, 84 Pac. 1002, the treasurer of an irrigation district, being sued for the payment of interest coupons on bonds issued by the district, denied on information and belief the signature of the secretary of the district upon such coupons. Such a denial was, in effect, the denial by the district, through one of its officers, of the signature of its own secretary—clearly a fact which was presumptively within the knowledge of the treasurer of the district. Moreover, in this case the court found as a fact that the coupons bore the lithographic signature of the said secretary.

We think it plain that the defendant's denial in the case at bar, based upon lack of information and belief, raised an issue, and put the plaintiff to the proof of the note and mortgage and the indebtedness due thereon. There being no evidence introduced on these points the finding of the court is unsupported, and is therefore erroneous.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

McPHERSON v. EBERHARD TANNING CO. et al. (Civ. 1819.) (District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 25, 1916.) Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge. Action by Rose J. McPherson against the Eberhard Tanning Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Eberhard Tanning Company appeals. Affirmed, as modified. S. G. Tompkins, of San Jose, for appellant. H. C. Jones and W. F. James, both of San Jose, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The court is of the opinion that the evidence sustains the finding of the trial court with respect to the exercise of the option to purchase the land; and the court is also of the opinion that the finding of the trial court that the interest should be computed up to the time of the tender only is justified and sustained by the evidence. It is conceded by counsel for the respondent that the judgment should be modified, so as to provide for a personal judgment against J. C. McPherson for the sum of $805, with interest up to the time of the tender. The judgment is therefore modified, so as to provide for a personal judgment against said J. C. McPherson for the sum of $805, with interest up to the time of the tender, and the trial court is hereby directed to so modify the same; in all other respects the judgment is affirmed; the appellant to recover its costs of this appeal.

CORDS v. GOODWIN et al. (L. A. 3738.)

1. MORTGAGES ⌘309(3) — RELEASE — SUFFICIENCY OF CONSIDERATION.

Where the purchaser gave a purchase-money mortgage on sale of 797 acres of land, and the question arose whether the parcel contained only 704 acres, his agreement to pay the mortgage to the value of 704 acres was sufficient consideration, in the absence of mutual mistake, for a release of that amount of land and for the agreement of the vendor's assignee to sue to determine ownership of the balance of the acreage.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⌘65(1) — SALE BY ACRE — EXTENT OF LIABILITY.

Under a sale of an undetermined acreage at a certain price per acre the purchaser is bound to pay only for the land actually included and conveyed.

3. EVIDENCE ⌘460(8) — PAROL EVIDENCE — MONUMENTS.

Where a government survey recited the distances and named the monuments, parol evidence was admissible to show that the actual distance was different from that given in the notes of the survey, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2077, subd. 2, which provides that in case of inconsistencies monuments control distances, since the purpose of the evidence is not to vary any writing.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ¶157—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—POSSESSION OF PROPERTY.

Where one makes an agreement of sale binding him to deliver possession to the purchaser, the purchaser is entitled to possession before being called upon to pay the price, and cannot be obliged to accept a mere paper title and rely on his success in an action for possession against adverse holder.

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ¶176—ABATEMENT—POSSESSION BY THIRD PERSON.

Although certain land is within the description in a purchase-money mortgage, the mortgagor is entitled to an abatement for any portion of the land of which he cannot gain possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 333-340; Dec. Dig. ¶176.]

6. MORTGAGES ¶309(3)—SATISFACTION—ACTS—PARTIES.

The vendee gave a purchase-money mortgage covering 797 acres. It was afterwards discovered that he obtained possession of only 704 acres, and that an adjoining owner held the balance. The purchaser agreed to pay the mortgage to the extent of the land in his possession in exchange for a release and a seller's agreement to sue to determine title to the balance. Held that, in an action by the assignee of the mortgage to cancel and to reform the release in which the adverse holder was not made a party, the mortgage could not be held to be satisfied, since the mortgagor obtained the record title, and might thereafter establish title as against the adverse holder, in which case the mortgage would be valid as to the balance of the land.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Samuel E. Crow, Judge.

Suit by R. Cords, Jr., against J. W. Goodwin and others. From an order denying motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part, and in part reversed and remanded.

C. M. Fickert, of San Francisco, and E. A. Lane, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Canfield & Starbuck, of Santa Barbara, and Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick and Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This case comes up on an appeal by the plaintiff from an order denying his motion for new trial. The object of the action was to cancel a certain agreement relating to the satisfaction of a mortgage, to reform a release of the mortgage executed in pursuance of said agreement, and thereupon to foreclose said mortgage. The ground on which the relief was asked was that the agreement and release were given in consequence of a mutual mistake of the parties.

On June 18, 1908, one Tillmann made an agreement in writing to sell to Goodwin a tract of land, stating therein that it contained 797 acres, more or less, at $150 per acre, making a total price of $119,550. The agreement provided that when two-thirds of the price was paid Tillmann should convey the land to Goodwin and Goodwin should execute a mortgage thereon for the remaining $39,850. The land at that time was all inclosed by fences except a small tract in the northeast corner. Goodwin took possession of the land within the fences and of the small uninclosed tract, and has ever since held possession thereof. On June 14, 1910, Goodwin having paid the two-thirds of the purchase money, Tillmann conveyed the land to him, and he executed the mortgage to Tillmann thereon for the remainder of the price. At the time this was done Goodwin claimed that the tract contained less than the 797 acres called for by the agreement. It was then understood between them that the matter would be adjusted before the mortgage was paid. Afterwards Tillmann assigned the mortgage to the plaintiff, Cords, who, as it seems, took with knowledge of the facts concerning the shortage. The land was in township 9 north, range 32 west, in Santa Barbara county. The remainder of the description as given in the instruments was as follows:

"Of section 28, the whole; of section 27, the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter, the fractional south half of the northwest quarter, and the fractional southwest quarter."

The land was bounded on the east by the westerly line of a Mexican grant known as the Tinaquaic rancho. The intersection of this line caused the fractional subdivisions of section 27.

Soon after the execution of the mortgage Goodwin caused a survey to be made of the land inclosed by the fences and the small uninclosed tract in the northeast corner by Flournoy, the county surveyor, and found that the amount of land of which he had obtained possession was only 704.01 acres, making a difference of 92.99 acres between the actual amount of land obtained and that called for by the agreement of sale. The balance of the purchase price secured by the mortgage became due on June 18, 1911. In July, 1911, being ready to pay the balance justly due, Goodwin showed to Cords, who then held the mortgage, the map of the land made by Flournoy, displaying the lines of the fences and of the tract surveyed by Flournoy, informed Cords that the survey showed only 704.01 acres in his possession, and stated that it was supposed that some part of the land described in the mortgage was in the possession of one Hansen, who owned the land adjoining the tract on the north. The agreement dated July 22, 1911, was then executed by Cords and Goodwin to provide for the adjustment of the discrepancy in the acreage. It referred to the original agreement of sale with Tillmann, stated that said sale was made on the basis of 797 acres at $150 per acre, that two-thirds of the price had been paid and the mortgage executed for the remainder, that Goodwin claimed an offset against the mortgage because of a partial failure of consideration growing out of the fact that the land contained less acreage than the contract called for, and declared that it was made to reconcile and settle said claim. It provided that Goodwin should pay at once $25,901.50 on the mortgage, being the balance of the price for the 704.01 acres; that on receipt thereof Cords should execute to Goodwin "a release from the lien of said mortgage of all land lying south of a line drawn from the northeast corner of section 29 in said township and range; thence east to the westerly line of the Tinaquaic rancho, at a point distant south 23° 45' W., 513.13 feet distant from a redwood post marked 'T. No. 1, F F F' set for the northwesterly corner of said rancho"; that Goodwin should, at the expense of Cords, immediately sue the claimants of the land lying north of said last-described line; that, if he thereby succeeded in establishing that any of the land described in his deed lay north of said line, and should recover possession thereof accordingly, "then the sum of $13,948.50 shall be and become immediately due and payable if land so recovered shall equal 92.99 acres, and, if less than 92.99 acres, the balance due and payable upon said mortgage shall be reduced" proportionately; and that upon payment of the amount so ascertained the mortgage should be entirely canceled.

On the same day Goodwin paid the \$25,901.50, and Cords executed the release. The release recited the giving of the mortgage, its assignment to Cords, the payment of \$25,901.50, and declared that Cords thereby released from the lien of the mortgage "all of the property described in said mortgage lying south of the following line, viz.: Commencing at the common corner of sections 20, 21, 28, and 29, in township 9 north, range 32 west, San Bernardino base and meridian, and extending thence easterly to a point in the northwesterly line of the Tinaquaic rancho, which point is situated south 23 degrees 45 minutes west and distant 513.13 feet from the northwest corner of said Tinaquaic rancho, containing seven hundred and four and $\frac{1}{100}$ acres. It being the intention hereof to leave ninety-two and $\frac{99}{100}$ acres of land still subject to the lien of said mortgage." The court found, and the evidence shows, that the line described in the release was the same line as that described in the agreement, although the release does not mention the redwood post marked "T. No. 1, F F F." Goodwin commenced a suit, as provided in the agreement, against one Hansen, for the recovery of the land believed to be north of the line above described, but, finding that the fence line on the north coincided with the north line of the land mortgaged, the suit, at the request of Cords, was dismissed.

The complaint alleges that said release and agreement were executed "under a mutual mistake of fact, to wit: It being represented by the defendant J. W. Goodwin, and believed by the plaintiff, that there was an adverse claim to that portion of said mortgaged premises lying north of a line described in said partial release as commencing at the" northwest corner of section 28 "and extending thence easterly to a point in the northwesterly line of the Tinaquaic rancho, which point is situated south 23° 45' W., and distant 513.13 feet from the northeast corner of said Tinaquaic rancho, containing 92.99 acres," that plaintiff was induced to and did make such agreement and release in the belief that said representations set forth in said agreement were correct, but that, in fact, there is not and never has been any adverse claim to any of said mortgaged premises, and that the same are correctly described in the said agreement of July 18, 1908. The complaint, in a second count, alleges that the agreement and release were executed without consideration. A third count alleges the execution of the mortgage and the part payments aforesaid, and asks foreclosure thereof.

With respect to the alleged mistake the findings are not clear. They state that the agreement and release were not executed by the parties thereto under any mutual or other mistake of fact; that Goodwin did not represent, nor Cords believe, that there was an adverse claim to any part of the land mortgaged. But this is preceded by the finding that they both agreed and admitted that all of the tract mortgaged lying outside of the said fences was held adversely by third parties, but that nevertheless they "mutually doubted whether said northerly boundary thereof coincided with said northerly fence line as shown on said map (made by Flournoy), or ran in a northeasterly direction from" the northwesterly corner of section 28, so as to include north of the fence the whole or a part of the remaining 92.99 acres, and that thereupon, for the purpose of paying for the 704.01 acres received in possession by Goodwin and resolving said doubt as to the remainder of the 797 acres, and to provide for the payment for all or any part of said remainder if any part thereof lay north of said described line, they made the said agreement. The finding last mentioned, taken in connection with the contents of the agreement and release and the finding that none of the land lay north of said line, are, in effect, findings that the agreement and release were both executed under a mutual mistake, and that the mistake consisted in the common belief that some of the land did lie north of the described line. This, in substance, was the mistake alleged. If the court intended to find otherwise, such finding would be contrary to the effect of the instruments, coupled with the undisputed facts proven by the evidence. We must therefore consider the case on the theory that the mistake alleged was sufficiently established, and that the plaintiff should have the relief he would be entitled to by reason of that fact.

The court also found that the mortgage and any and all indebtedness thereby secured had been and is fully paid and satisfied, that no part of the land described therein remained subject to said mortgage, as security or otherwise, and that the release and agreement of July 22, 1911, were executed for a valuable consideration. These findings are challenged by the plaintiff on the ground that they are contrary to the evidence.

[1] The mutual agreements of the respective parties, that of Goodwin to immediately pay the $25,901.50 and begin the action against the claimants of the land lying north-erly of the described line, and that of Cords to release from the mortgage lien all land lying south of said line, were sufficient consideration to uphold the agreement and release if they had been freely made without mutual mistake. There is no merit in the claim that they were without consideration.

[2] The important and controlling question is whether or not the finding that the mortgage is satisfied is supported by the evidence. If the mortgage is satisfied, the case is at an end. It would avail nothing to the plaintiff to have the release reformed so as to leave a part of the land unreleased, if the mortgage itself is no longer of any force, as would be the case if it is satisfied.

The following propositions are determinative of the question: (1) The sale of the land by Tillmann to Goodwin was a sale of an undetermined area of land by the acre at $150 per acre for the quantity conveyed by a good and sufficient title. This proposition is established by the terms of the agreement of sale and by the terms of the agreement and release of July 22, 1911. The parties so understood it, and they have acted accordingly. (2) Upon such a sale the purchaser is bound to pay only for the land which is included within the tract described, at the agreed price per acre, and when he has done so his debt for the purchase money is discharged. (3) The agreement of sale bound Tillmann to convey by good title and to deliver possession to the purchaser. In such a case, even if it is a sale in gross, the vendor cannot recover the purchase money for any part of the land of which he is unable to give the purchaser the possession. As to such part, if any, there is a failure of consideration of the mortgage, equivalent to a satisfaction pro tanto.

It needs no argument to establish the proposition that upon the sale of land at a fixed price, by the acre, and not in gross, the price to be paid is determined by the number of acres actually included in the tract conveyed.

"If an estate be sold at so much per acre, and there is a deficiency in the number conveyed, the purchaser will be entitled to a compensation." 1 Sugden on Vendors, 324 (Perkins' edition, 489).

Upon this rule Goodwin is entitled to a deduction from the mortgage to the extent that there is a shortage in the number of acres included in the tracts described therein. The tracts consisted of government subdivisions which, according to the courses and distances set forth in the government survey, embraced an area of 796.76 acres, instead of 797 acres as stated in the agreement of sale, a discrepancy too small to be worthy of notice. Section 28 by that survey included 640 acres. The survey made by Flournoy showed that it contained only 626.29 acres.

[3] The appellant errs in his claim that the number of acres within that section is conclusively settled by the government survey, and that no evidence can be received to contradict it in that respect. Such evidence does not contradict the record survey, within the meaning of the rule forbidding evidence to contradict writings. It merely serves to show that the distances given in the survey between the monuments at the respective corners of the sections are not accurate. The rule is that measurements always give way to monuments, and that parol evidence can always be given to show that the actual distance is different from the distances given in the notes of the survey. Code Civ. Proc. § 2077. This will of necessity show a discrepancy between the actual acreage and that stated as part of the description.

[4] The third proposition is also well established. Where one makes an agreement of sale binding him to deliver possession to the purchaser, such purchaser is entitled to possession before being called upon to pay the price. He is not obliged to accept a mere paper title to the property and rely upon his success in an action for possession against the person holding adversely. Pierce v. Edwards, 150 Cal. 653, 89 Pac. 600; Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 58, 25 Pac. 249, 681; King v. Knapp, 59 N. Y. 467; Shriver v. Shriver, 86 N. Y. 584; *Tyson v. [5] The shortage in section 28 accounts for 13.71 of the total shortage of 92.99 acres. Under the second proposition above stated the mortgagor is entitled to a rebate of $2,056.50 on the purchase price and a corresponding reduction on the mortgage debt, by reason of this deficiency in the area of that section.

According to the notation on the government survey, there should have been 156.76 acres of land in the subdivisions of section 27 included in the conveyance and mortgage, or, in round numbers, as the parties stated it, 157 acres. The area as determined by Flournoy would leave a shortage of 79.28 acres in the several tracts lying in section 27 described in the deed and mortgage. The evidence shows that this shortage is caused by the encroachment of the owner of the adjoining Tinaquale rancho upon the easterly side of section 27. Many years ago, in establishing the boundaries which he claimed, the owner of that rancho set fences along the westerly boundary thereof adjoining section 27. The evidence indicates that he has ever since maintained the fences on the line thus located. It overlaps the boundaries of the subdivisions of section 27 aforesaid far enough to include this shortage of 79.28 acres. This land is properly within the bounds of the descriptions contained in the mortgage, but the purchaser, Goodwin, has never obtained possession thereof, and apparently Tillmann and Cords, his successor in the mortgage, are unable to deliver the possession thereof to him. Under the authorities above stated, Goodwin is clearly entitled to an abatement upon the mortgage debt to the amount of this shortage. A case precisely in point is Voorhees v. De Meyer, 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 37. The facts were identical, in effect, with those here disclosed, and the decision was that the purchaser was entitled to compensation by a rebate on the purchase price.

[6] These two discrepancies completely account for the unpaid portion of the mortgage debt. If the proper parties were before the court, so that the decision on the question would be binding on all persons concerned, we could justly hold that the finding that the mortgage is satisfied is sustained by the evidence. The difficulty arises from the fact that the owners of the Tinaquale rancho, who are in possession of the overlap included within the mortgage description, are not parties to the action. The defendants have acquired the record title to the land included in the overlap, but have not received possession. If the judgment stands in its present condition, we cannot say that the defendants may not hereafter be able to obtain possession of this overlap. The mortgage debt is not fully paid. If the defendants should succeed in obtaining possession of the overlap, or if the plaintiff should succeed in procuring it for them, he would be entitled to enforce his mortgage for the balance thereof unpaid and chargeable to this overlap against the land included in the overlap. With the record as it stands, this right cannot be preserved to him. The evidence, it may be observed, indicates that this right is barren of any benefit, and that he would meet with inevitable failure because of the long-continued adverse possession of the adjoining owners. But this cannot be conclusively determined in a suit in which the adjoining owners are not parties. The legal possibility of obtaining possession of this land must, so far as the record as it now stands is concerned, remain open. The mortgage is not absolutely satisfied, but only conditionally so; that is, it is satisfied so far as the land in possession of the defendants is concerned, but it remains a possible lien for the proportional part of the balance unpaid thereon upon the land included in the overlap. The finding is to that extent unsupported by the evidence. This possibility of the right is not of sufficient importance to warrant a new trial upon all the issues in the case. Nor does it make it necessary that the judgment be vacated with respect to the land in possession of the defendants. Upon this appeal from the order denying a new trial we cannot modify the judgment so as to preserve this possible lien to the plaintiff, or otherwise protect the respective parties. We can only make a limited order for a new trial respecting it. In order to make a new trial as to the overlap and the mortgage lien thereon of any substantial benefit to the parties, it is necessary that the persons in adverse possession thereof be made parties to the action; as otherwise no judgment respecting the overlap declaring it subject to the mortgage would be of any benefit to the defendants to entitle them to possession, or to the plaintiff to entitle him to foreclose. If those persons have not acquired adverse title by prescription or otherwise, the overlap found to exist would be subject to the mortgage. If they have such title, of course no judgment could be given against them. Substantial justice can be done with respect to this overlap by directing a new trial of the case with respect thereto, providing the plaintiff shall bring in the persons in possession thereof as parties to the action, so that they may be bound thereby, and allowing the judgment to stand as it is with respect to all of the land in the possession of the defendant. As the plaintiff had notice that other persons had possession and claimed title to the land lying easterly of said fence, before he began this action, and did not make them parties, he should not recover costs on this appeal because of the limited reversal of the order.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed so far as it affects the land described in the mortgage and lying westerly of the line of the fence surveyed by Flournoy in 1910 as the westerly line of the Tinaquale rancho. With respect to the land described in the mortgage lying easterly of said fence, the order is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial. Upon such new trial the court below is directed to allow the pleadings to be amended, to bring in as new parties the persons claiming the said overlap, and thereupon to determine whether or not the present defendants, in virtue of their title derived from Tillmann, are entitled to possession of said overlap, and, if it concludes that they are so entitled, to enforce said mortgage against the land by foreclosing the same for the amount of land included in the overlap at the agreed price of $150 per acre. It is further ordered that each party shall pay his own costs upon this appeal.

1. NEGLIGENCE $\hookrightarrow$ 101—EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

By the Employers' Liability Act (St. 1911, p. 796), contributory negligence of an employé does not bar his recovery against the employer for personal injuries, if it is slight and that of the employer and fellow servant gross in comparison; and the jury may diminish the damages according to the portion of negligence chargeable to the employé.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by John F. Lassen against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for defendant on granting of its motion for nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Riddle & Cheroske, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Henry T. Gage, W. I. Foley, W. I. Gilbert, J. W. McKinley, and R. C. Gortner, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant's motion for a nonsuit was granted, and judgment was thereupon given in its favor. The plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant in the capacity of machinist's helper in the defendant's roundhouse in the city of Los Angeles; that on August 9, 1912, while so employed, the plaintiff was directed by the machinist, under whose supervision he worked, to remove a certain "binder," a large, heavy piece of steel used in repairing a locomotive, from one part of the roundhouse to and alongside of the pit in which the machinist was working and over which a locomotive was standing; that he proceeded to do so by dragging the binder and upon arriving at the said pit the plaintiff dropped the end of the binder held by him to the floor, where it struck the end of a steel chisel causing the chisel to fly upward and strike the plaintiff in his left eye, totally destroying his sight therein; that said chisel had been by the defendant, or some of its officers or agents, negligently and carelessly dropped, laid, or left at the place from whence it struck the plaintiff.

There was a trial by jury, and at the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant filed a motion for nonsuit, which was granted by the court, judgment thereafter being entered that plaintiff recover nothing in his action and that defendant recover from the plaintiff its costs.

[1] We think the court below erred in granting the motion for nonsuit. At the time of the injury complained of the Employers' Liability Act of 1911 was in force. Stats. 1911, p. 796. That statute abolished the previously available defenses of an employer, in an action by an employé for damages from personal injuries, that the plaintiff had assumed the risk of the hazard from which he was injured, and that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. Consequently, the case must be decided upon the principle that the employer was responsible for the negligence of his employés when such negligence caused injury to another of his employés, and for all injuries caused by dangers arising from the work itself or from the place where it is carried on. That statute also provided that contributory negligence of the employé should not bar his recovery if it was slight and that of the employer or fellow servant was gross, in comparison, and that in such cases the jury may diminish the damages according to the proportion of negligence chargeable to the employe.

The "binder" referred to was a piece of steel nearly 4 feet long, 4 inches thick, 5 inches wide, and weighed 180 pounds. The plaintiff moved this binder along the floor of the roundhouse from the place where it lay, 9 feet from the locomotive pit, to a place by the side of the pit some 18 inches or 2 feet therefrom, where it could be easily reached when needed by persons working in the pit. He did this by holding one end in his hands a foot above the floor and allowing the other end to drag along the floor. When he reached the desired place he let go of the binder, dropping the end he was holding to the floor. It fell upon the beveled end of a cold chisel lying there, causing the chisel to fly upward and strike his eye, inflicting the injury complained of. The place was not well lighted, the floor and the chisel were both of a dark color and he did not see the chisel. He did not know it was there. The machinist used such chisels in his work upon and under the locomotive while in the pit. It was the rule that when not in use the chisels were put in a box kept for that purpose. Sometimes, during hours of work, they would be laid on the edge of the pit, within 12 inches thereof, so as to be reached conveniently from the pit when wanted. All this the plaintiff knew. The end of the binder was dropped at a place from 18 inches to 2 feet from the edge of the pit. The evidence would have justified a finding that it was 2 feet away, and that such chisels were never placed that far away for any proper purpose connected with the work.

[2-5] If an agent of the defendant, or a fellow servant of the plaintiff in the service of the defendant, left the chisel at that place, it was clearly an act of negligence. The jury could reasonably have inferred that it had been carelessly left there by a fellow servant. Its presence there made the place dangerous for the work the plaintiff was doing, as the event fully proved. Under the law as fixed by said statute, the plaintiff did not assume the risk of injury therefrom, and the defendant is not excused by the fact that a fellow servant may have carelessly left it there. If the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to observe the chisel, it was a question of fact for the jury. If it so found, the jury might reasonably have concluded that such contributory negligence was slight and that the negligent act of leaving the chisel there was gross by comparison, in which case the plaintiff would have been entitled to a verdict. In deciding a motion for a nonsuit, "every favorable inference fairly deducible from the evidence produced 'must be considered as facts' proved" in favor of the plaintiff. If there is any substantial evidence tending to prove all the facts in issue constituting the plaintiff's case, he is entitled to have the case go to the jury for a verdict on the merits. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 586, 82 Pac. 252; Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 515, 123 Pac. 294. Applying these rules it is clear that the case should have been submitted to the jury for its decision. There was substantial evidence of all the facts above stated, as well as of the other facts alleged by plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed.

1. FRAUD $\hookrightarrow$ 12—NONPERFORMANCE OF PROMISE—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4, defining actual fraud, breach of a railroad's promise "that no intoxicating liquor would ever be sold or given away" in a town which it was developing did not amount to actionable fraud, since the making of a promise does not constitute fraud unless it is made without any intention of performing it.

2. FRAUD $\hookrightarrow$ 42—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—PLEADING.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett and Howard A. Pears, Judges.

Action by Charlotte E. Ayers and another against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, an order denying defendants a new trial, and an order denying defendants' motion for a judgment on the findings, the named defendant appeals. Judgment and orders reversed.

Frank McGowan, Frank Thunen and Wm. M. Singer, all of San Francisco (William Singer, Jr., of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Street & Street, of Oakland, and Charles Del Bondio, of Taft, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Three appeals by the defendants are presented by the record, one from the judgment, a second from an order denying a new trial, the third from an order denying defendants' motion for a judgment on the findings. The judgment is against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company alone.

The complaint purports to state a cause of action for damages to plaintiffs' business and property, arising from the failure of the defendants to prevent the keeping of saloons and the sale of liquors in the town wherein the property of plaintiffs was situated. We will now state the allegations of fact upon which the claim is predicated.

The defendant Southern Pacific Railroad Company, being the owner of a tract of land in Kern county, laid it off into blocks, lots, and streets, called it the town of Moron, and filed a map thereof in the office of the county recorder on July 1, 1909. It then adopted and made public "a general scheme or plan" that no alcoholic liquors "should ever be sold or kept for sale or given away upon any of the lands" situated within said town, and that no part thereof should be sold or conveyed, except upon a covenant and condition inserted in the agreement or deed, as a part of its consideration, by the purchaser, his heirs, successors, or assigns, that no alcoholic liquors should ever be sold, kept for sale, or given away thereon, and that a breach of the condition should work a forfeiture and a reverter to said company. This general scheme or plan was carried out, and every deed and agreement of sale of every lot or parcel of land sold within said town contained the covenant and condition subsequent above stated. Said company, through its agents, engaged in the sale of said lots, "represented and stated to plaintiffs that it was the general scheme and plan of the defendants in laying out and platting said town of Moron that no intoxicating liquor should ever be sold or given away therein, and that no intoxicating liquor would ever be sold or given away therein," and that a covenant would be inserted in every deed and agreement of sale, as above stated. The plaintiff Charlotte E. Ayers is the real party in interest, C. W. Ayers being joined as plaintiff solely because he is her husband. Believing said representations and relying thereon, she bought seven lots in Moron. Believing that said liquor covenant was binding upon every purchaser of a lot, "and that defendants would enforce said covenants and not permit any purchaser or owner of any lot within said town of Moron to sell or give away any intoxicating liquors therein, and relying on said representations and statements of defendants," she erected a hotel on her said lots, furnished it, and on June 16, 1910, engaged in the hotel business therein, and has ever since continued in said business. In January and February, 1911, several saloons and a restaurant were established in said town by divers persons on lots sold by said company by deed containing the aforesaid covenants and conditions, and the business of selling intoxicating liquors has ever since been carried on in said saloons, in violation of said covenants and conditions, and with the "full knowledge, consent, and permission of said defendants." The said restaurant has been and is conducted as a place where intoxicating liquors are sold, and it has caused a loss of patronage to said plaintiff in her hotel dining room, to her damage in the sum of $5,000. The saloons have caused people to leave plaintiff's hotel and patronize the saloons and restaurant aforesaid. By reason of said withdrawal of patronage from plaintiff's hotel she is unable to sell her property, and by reason of the keeping of said saloons plaintiff's property has depreciated in value to her damage in the sum of $25,000. Defendants, though often requested by plaintiff so to do, have failed and refused to prohibit, stop, prevent, and enjoin said persons from selling intoxicating liquors in said town of Moron. The court below found these allegations to be true in the main, and assessed the plaintiff's damage from loss of patronage in her hotel at $5,000, and from depreciation in the value of her property at $15,000. The judgment was for $20,000.

[1, 2] The charge that the defendant represented to plaintiff that it was its general plan that no intoxicating liquors should be sold in Moron and that the covenant to that effect should be inserted in each deed and agreement amounts to nothing as a basis for the action, for these were not false representations. The things occurred in accordance with the representations.

The only other representation was in regard to the future; that is, "that no intoxicating liquor would ever be sold or given away" in said town. Even if this be regarded as a promise, rather than a prediction, and a promise which was not fulfilled, or of which performance was refused, it does not amount to fraud. The making of a promise does not constitute fraud unless it is made without any intention of performing it. Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4. "The mere failure to perform the covenant does not relate back to and render the same fraudulent." Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 131, 20 Pac. 384, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29. It is not alleged that the so-called promise was made without any intention of performing it, nor even that it was made with intent to deceive or defraud the plaintiff, or to induce her to buy the property. Such allegations are necessary in pleading false representations as fraud. Heller v. Dyerville Mfg. Co., 116 Cal. 133, 47 Pac. 1016. The complaint cannot be sustained on the ground that it states a cause of action for damages produced by fraud or deceit. Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 528, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162; Woodroof v. Howes, 88 Cal. 190, 26 Pac. 111.

[3] The complaint does not allege that the statement "that no intoxicating liquor would ever be sold or given away" in the town of Moron was made as a promise or agreement. Literally the allegation means only that the defendant merely stated it as a fact that would occur or as a matter of opinion and prophecy. In neither case would such a statement constitute a binding contract or warranty that the future should be according to the prophecy or a basis for an action. Rendell v. Scott, 70 Cal. 514, 11 Pac. 779; Holton v. Noble, 83 Cal. 7, 23 Pac. 58; Nounnan v. Sutter County L. Co., 81 Cal. 6, 22 Pac. 515, 6 L. R. A. 219.

[4] Conceding, however, that it may be taken as an allegation that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company thereupon entered into an undertaking or contract that no intoxicating liquor would ever be sold or given away in said town, we are met with the objection that there was no legal evidence to support the allegation. The only evidence offered consisted of declarations made by the agent of the railroad company to the plaintiffs at the time of making the sale to Mrs. Ayres of two of the lots. One S. C. Birchard was appointed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, as its agent, to effect the sale of the lots in Moron. His appointment was in writing. It authorized him to—

"make earnest and active effort to effect the sale of such lots at the prices and upon the terms, and subject to such agreements and conditions and restrictions as the railroad company may instruct."

The method of sale adopted was that each person desiring to purchase a lot should sign a written application to the railroad company to become such purchaser, the application would then be forwarded to the general office of the railroad company at San Francisco for approval, and, if approved, would be returned to Birchard. An agreement for the sale would then be prepared and signed by the railroad company and the purchaser, providing that upon payment of the price the railroad company would execute a deed to said purchaser. The forms of applications for purchase were prepared and printed by the railroad company, and were by it furnished to Birchard. The purchase by the plaintiff Charlotte E. Ayers of lots in Moron was made in this way. The application signed by the plaintiff was not introduced in evidence, and its contents do not appear in the record. There is no evidence that the undertaking alleged was contained therein, as, indeed, it could not be, since it was signed only by the purchaser. The agreement signed by both parties declared that, as a part of the consideration of the sale, it was made subject to the condition that no intoxicating liquor "shall ever be sold or kept for sale or given away upon said premises," upon the penalty of forfeiture and reversion of title to the company in case of a breach thereof, and that said condition and covenant should be written into the deed and should run with the land. These provisions were also inserted in the deed executed by the railroad company to the plaintiff in pursuance of said sale. Neither the agreement nor the deed contained any stipulation or undertaking on the part of the railroad company that it would undertake to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors forever, or at all, in the town of Moron. C. W. Ayers testified that Birchard, during the negotiations attending the sale, said—

"that there never would be any liquor sold in the town of Moron; that it was intended and purposed to be a dry town, that no liquor would be allowed to be sold under any circumstances by anybody."

This statement is the only evidence of the undertaking relied on. It was admitted over the objection of the defendants that Birchard had no authority to enter into such an agreement on behalf of the railroad company, and that it was incompetent to vary an agreement in writing by evidence of such declarations. That it was inadmissible over these objections is clear. It comes within the rule of section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure that "when the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties, it is to be considered as containing all those terms," and, therefore that between the parties "no evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing" can be given. The section states the exceptions to the rule. They are that parol evidence is admissible for some purposes where a mistake or imperfection in the writing is in issue, or its validity is in dispute, or where it is necessary to explain an extrinsic ambiguity, or to establish illegality or fraud. This case does not come within any of the exceptions.

[5] The so-called agreement that sales of liquor should never take place in Moron was essentially a warranty regarding the permanent advantages of the property sold. Such a warranty, if made, would be a part of the contract of sale and not collateral thereto. To justify the admission of parol evidence of a contract between parties who have made an agreement in writing, on the ground that it is collateral, it must be upon a subject distinct from that to which the writing relates. Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 594, 96 Pac. 319. Here the written agreement itself speaks on the subject of the sale of intoxicating liquors, and provides that none shall ever be sold on the premises described. To add to this provision the further stipulation that none should ever be sold in the entire town of Moron and that the railroad company should see that none was ever sold there, would be to add by parol to a written agreement which on its face purports to be complete upon that subject, and which, under section 1856, is presumed to embrace all the terms agreed on. Such evidence is inadmissible. Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 330, 26 Pac. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469; Germain F. Co. v. Armsby Co., supra; Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 319, 81 Pac. 964; Empire I. Co. v. Mort, 169 Cal. 739, 147 Pac. 960; Johnson v. Bibb L. Co., 140 Cal. 99, 73 Pac. 730.

The case does not come within the rule of such cases as Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 521, 32 Pac. 571, and Whittier v. Home Savings Bank, 161 Cal. 317, 119 Pac. 92, cited by respondent, that evidence of a contract in parol may be given if it is upon a subject upon which the contract is silent. The contract was not silent on the subject. The conversation itself, in which the declaration is said to have been made, covered the conditions actually inserted in the agreement, as well as the stipulation claimed to have been made by parol. The presumption is conclusive that by signing the agreement afterwards executed and containing no such stipulation, the parties finally determined not to insist on that stipulation.

[6] It is also clear that Birchard had no authority to make such an agreement for the railroad company. His authority was in writing, and it not only did not authorize him to make such an agreement, but limited his power in that regard to such terms and conditions as the principal should instruct him to make. While it may be that the authority simply to make sales would include power to make the ordinary covenants and stipulations usually included in an agreement of sale, as to which we express no opinion, it cannot be that it would give power to make such an extraordinary and unheard of agreement as that here claimed, an agreement to forever prevent any and all sales of intoxicating liquors by any and all persons, within the area of a town, whether incorporated or not, an undertaking which the state itself, with all its sovereign powers over its inhabitants, is unable to carry out. Such power could not be implied from the mere appointment of an agent to sell land.

Our conclusion is that the judgment is not sustained by the evidence.

The judgment and orders appealed from are reversed.

HILDEBRAND et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT
IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 7744.)

(Supreme Court of California, July 20, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐78(1)—JUDGMENTS AND ORDERS APPEALABLE.

In an action to quiet title, an order directing the defendant to assign to plaintiff a note and mortgage upon payment to him of principal, interest, and notary and attorney fees, and subrogating plaintiff to the rights of mortgagee, is in legal effect a final judgment as to defendant and appealable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 426, 470, 472; Dec. Dig. ⇐78(1).]

2. CERTIORARI ⇐5(1)—ORDERS REVIEWABLE—APPEALABLE ORDERS.

Such an order, being appealable, cannot, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, be reviewed on certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⇐5(1).]

3. CERTIORARI ⇐33(2) — WHO MAY MAINTAIN—PERSONS BENEFICIALLY INTERESTED.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1069, providing that only persons beneficially interested may maintain certiorari, held, that in an action to quiet title an order directing defendant to assign to plaintiff a mortgage, and subrogating plaintiff to the rights of the mortgagee, cannot be reviewed on certiorari on the petition of the mortgagor and of mortgagees under a subsequent mortgage; they not being beneficially interested, since their rights could in no way be affected by the order.

In Bank. Writ of Review to Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edward P. Shortall, Judge.

Petition for certiorari by Ernest H. Hildebrand and others against the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and Hon. Edward P. Shortall, judge of said court. Proceedings dismissed.

Paul A. McCarthy, R. W. Gillogley, and Alexander D. Keyes, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding to annul for want of jurisdiction an order made by the superior court in the action of Martin v. Chiossi et al., an action to quiet title, directing the defendant Humboldt Savings Bank to execute to the plaintiff therein on payment of principal and interest due, notary fee, and attorney fee, an assignment of a note and mortgage constituting a first lien on the real property involved in the action, and subrogating plaintiff to the rights of said mortgagee. The petitioners for the writ are Hildebrand, Lettich, and Mr. and Mrs. George H. Chiossi, who were originally the defendants in said action, and Humboldt Savings Bank, which was sued as John Doe, and answered.

The action is one instituted December 15, 1915, plaintiff Martin alleging that ever since December 24, 1914, he has been the owner of the property by virtue of a deed executed to him on that day by George H. Chiossi, who it is alleged was then the sole owner of the property. On January 28, 1916, defendants Lettich and Hildebrand demurred to the complaint, and on February 1, 1916, Mr. and Mrs. Chiossi demurred to the complaint. These demurrers apparently have not been disposed of. The bank answered denying the allegations of the complaint, and alleging that on December 26, 1912, the defendants Hildebrand and Lettich were the owners of the property, borrowed $3,000 on it, and gave a note payable December 26, 1914, and a mortgage on such land to secure payment thereof, and that no payment was ever made thereon.

On January 31, 1916, plaintiff Martin asked the superior court for an order requiring the bank to show cause why it should not accept from plaintiff the amount due on its note and mortgage and assign same to plaintiff, and why an order should not be made subrogating plaintiff to all of its rights. An affidavit filed by said plaintiff Martin stated substantially that on January 15, 1914, George Chiossi was the sole owner in fee of said property and gave a note and a mortgage on the property to Hildebrand and Lettich for $3,500 (the second mortgage on the property), that they obtained a decree of foreclosure, and that a sale was had thereunder July 14, 1915, Hildebrand and Lettich becoming purchasers for $2,000. Allegations were made therein that Martin made a good offer of redemption which was refused, and that after this Hildebrand and Lettich gave Chiossi a certificate of redemption, and Chiossi gave Hildebrand and Lettich a deed of trust as security for $3,500.

On January 31, 1916, an order to show cause was made as asked and on February 4, 1916, the motion of plaintiff was granted, the order purporting to subrogate the plaintiff Martin to the rights of the bank. Apparently this order was made without any notice of application whatever to anybody except the bank. On February 5, 1916, a motion to set aside this order was made by Hildebrand and Lettich and Mr. and Mrs. Chiossi. On February 9, 1916, this matter was argued and submitted.

The affidavit of George Chiossi filed on this motion stated substantially that ever since January 15, 1914, he was the sole owner of this property, and that on said day he mortgaged it to Hildebrand and Lettich for $3,500. That thereafter he executed the so-called deed to plaintiff, but that the same was intended as and was only a mortgage to secure notes given to Martin, that his wife did not sign this instrument to Martin, and that on March 23, 1915, he filed a declaration of homestead covering the property. That thereafter, on June 3, 1915, plaintiff recorded his so-called deed; that Hildebrand and Lettich subsequently foreclosed their mortgage and the property was sold to them; that he, Chiossi, redeemed from said foreclosure and was given a certificate of redemption; and that he objected to the assignment of the mortgage of the bank to plaintiff.

The affidavit of Hildebrand stated that because the wife of Chiossi did not sign the mortgage to plaintiff Martin, and because the homestead was selected prior to such mortgage being placed of record, plaintiff had not thenceforth even a lien. He also stated that plaintiff seeks the assignment for the purpose of harassing affiant and Lettich, and the Chiossis, by enforcing the mortgage.

On February 15, 1916, all objections were overruled and on the same day the formal order was made directing the assignment by the bank to plaintiff Martin of its debt and mortgage, and subrogating said plaintiff to all its rights thereunder. This is the order sought to be annulled.

[1] It seems apparent that in so far as the petitioner bank is concerned the order complained of must be regarded as, in legal effect, a final judgment, and therefore appealable. It completely disposed of the case in so far as the bank was concerned by requiring it, upon payment of the amount alleged by it to be due on its note and mortgage, to assign such note and mortgage to the plaintiff, and subrogating said plaintiff to all its rights thereunder. So far as the bank is concerned, the amount due it on the debt on account of which it asserts a lien on the property is adjudicated, and it is ordered, upon payment of such amount, to assign its debt and mortgage to another, with the result that it can have no further interest in the property involved, and is entirely removed from the cause. Such an order must be held, in view of our decisions, to be substantially a final judgment as to the bank for the purposes of an appeal. This subject was exhaustively discussed in Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. California, etc., Co., 159 Cal. 489-491, 114 Pac. 838, where all the authorities are cited. See, also, Anglo-Californian Bank v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 755, 96 Pac. 803.

[2] It has uniformly been held by this court, in accord with the provisions of section 1068, Code of Civil Procedure, that if a party has the right of appeal from an order in excess of jurisdiction, he cannot have such order reviewed in certiorari proceedings. This necessarily disposes of this proceeding in so far as the petitioner bank is concerned.

[3] As to the other petitioners: Only one "beneficially interested" may maintain certiorari proceedings. Code Civ. Proc. § 1069. Consideration of the question has satisfied us that the facts show no such interest in any other petitioner than the bank as would warrant the maintenance of such a proceeding by him. This question was practically decided in Swain v. Stockton Sav., etc., Soc., 78 Cal. 600, 21 Pac. 365, 12 Am. St. Rep. 118, an action by a plaintiff seeking to be subrogated to all the benefits of a defendant, the beneficiary under a deed of trust given to secure the payment of a debt, and to obtain delivery of the deed and all evidence of indebtedness secured thereby. The action was against the beneficiary (the real creditor) alone. It was claimed that the debtors, the so-called "mortgagors" giving the trust deed, were necessary parties to the action. This court held against such claim, saying:

"What the plaintiff sought in this action was that he might be placed in the same situation as the defendant in relation to the trustees under the trust deed, and to the judgment debtors who were the mortgagors in that instrument. This could only affect the defendant. It did not in any way impinge upon the rights of the trustees or the mortgagors. * * * So far as the mortgagors are concerned, it could not fix the amount of their indebtedness; they could have been heard to resist the payment of a greater sum than they owed, under the trust deed, when an attempt should be made to execute the trust. * * * In so far as the subrogation prayed for was concerned if granted, it could not alter the relation of the parties any more than if the plaintiff had by agreement purchased the debt of the defendant, and had it and the lien securing it transferred to himself."

All the petitioners here, other than the bank, are in the position of the "mortgagors" in the case cited. We cannot see that any legal right possessed by any of them can be affected in the slightest degree by the enforcement of the order complained of, and if this be the situation it is impossible to understand how any of them is "beneficially interested" in the matter within the meaning of our statute.

Regardless of other questions presented it follows from what has been said that this proceeding must be dismissed.

The proceeding is dismissed.

CAMERON v. PILLSBURY et al., State Industrial Accident Commission. (S. F. 7329.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 19, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT — 361 — WORKMAN'S COMPENSATION — COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT — "EMPLOYÉ."

Where the applicant had a contract for stipulated wage for service as a rental and insurance agent and a further contract with his employer for commission on renewals and new business, the employer being entitled under the contract to the entire time of the applicant and exercising control over his movements during business hours, he was an "employé," whether engaged in the regular work or under his commission contract, all the work being in the course of his employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 361.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé.]

In Bank. Application by Henry E. Trobitz for compensation before the Industrial Accident Commission, opposed by Hugh M. Cameron, employer. Heard on the employer's application for writ of review of the determination of A. J. Pillsbury and others, members of the Industrial Accident Commission, awarding compensation. Award affirmed.

Dunn, White & Aiken, of Oakland, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Review to consider the award of the Industrial Accident Commission under the following findings of fact:

"That Henry E. Trobitz, applicant herein, was injured by accident on the 20th day of June, 1914, while in the employment of defendant Hugh M. Cameron.

"That at the time of said accident the applicant was employed by the defendant in his real estate business in Oakland, Cal. That the applicant was paid a salary of $60 per month and in return for this amount was expected to perform certain services as directed, including the collection of rents, renting of houses, placing of signs upon houses, renewing of insurance policies, and collecting of premiums due upon such renewals. That the hours of labor of the applicant were from 8 a. m. to 6 p. m., and that the defendant had full direction and control over the labor and services of the applicant during these hours to whatever extent he chose to exercise it. That by the terms of said employment the applicant was to give his services exclusively to the defendant's business, unless relieved therefrom by permission of the defendant.

"That, to stimulate additional labor upon the part of the applicant, he was offered, in addition to the said sum of $60 per month, certain commissions upon new business brought by him into the defendant's office, provided that he did not neglect any assigned duties to search for such new business. That for all new insurance solicited and secured by the applicant he was to receive 15 per cent. and the defendant was to retain 10 per cent. of the commission accruing from such business; that for sales of real estate negotiated by the applicant he was to receive 33⅓ per cent. and the defendant was to retain 66⅔ per cent. of the commission accruing from such sales; that all negotiations instituted by the applicant for sales of real estate were to be brought into the defendant's office to be closed.

"That on the 20th day of June, 1914, the applicant left the office of the defendant to make some collections, and, after collecting one account for his employer, started for Alameda for the purpose of collecting the first premium upon an insurance policy which he had secured, and also for the purpose of entering into negotiations for the exchange of some real estate, both errands to be transacted with the same person; that neither errand was included within the services agreed to be rendered for the salary of $60 per month, but that, on each of said errands, if successful, the applicant would be entitled to his agreed commission and the defendant would receive the remainder of the profits thereon, in accordance with the agreement stated above. That the defendant knew before the said accident of some but not all of the details of the proposed negotiations for the exchange or sale of the said real estate and had conversed with the applicant concerning some of the phases of said proposed transaction, but that the defendant did not know that the applicant was going to endeavor to exchange or sell the said real estate on the 20th day of June, 1914, and did not direct him to undertake such errand. That, while on his way to Alameda on the said errands, the applicant was run into by a street car receiving the injuries which form the basis of this proceeding.

"And as its conclusions of fact, based upon the foregoing special finding of fact, the Industrial Accident Commission further finds that, at the time of the said accident, the applicant was paid for his services in part by the said salary and in part by a commission upon further business secured by him; that the applicant was, by the terms of his employment, to give substantially the whole of his services to the defendant's business; that the contract of employment of the applicant was one contract for substantially the whole of his services, the applicant to be compensated therefor by a salary and commission, and was not two separate and distinct contracts; that the defendant was authorized by the agreement of hire to exercise full control over the applicant during the whole of his working hours; that the defendant did exercise substantially as much control over the labors of the applicant in securing new business as over the mode of making collections or other services specifically agreed to be rendered; that the defendant exercised as much direction and control over the services of the applicant in securing new business as an average employer exercises over undoubted employes engaged in selling real estate; and that, therefore, at the time of said accident the injured employe was performing a service growing out of, incidental to, and in the course of his employment, and that the said accident arose out of and happened in the course of said employment."

Petitioner presents the proposition that Trobitz sustained a dual relationship to him, the one, that of employe, the other, that of "independent contractor or partner"; that, had he been injured while in pursuance of the duties for which he drew a salary of $60 a month, the award would be correct, but having been injured in the performance of these independent duties petitioner is not liable. We cannot agree with this view. The employer was entitled to all of Trobitz's working hours and was empowered to direct his labor. In either capacity he was an employe. It is not an uncommon thing for retail merchants, for laundrymen, and the like to pay a commission to the drivers of their delivery wagons for all new business which they bring in. It has never been held that this circumstance creates a distinct relationship in law. They are still employes, as was properly held by the Court of Appeal under similar facts in Sumner v. Nevin, 4 Cal. App. 347, 87 Pac. 1105. A certain amount of freedom of action was inherent in the nature of the work which the injured man performed, but this, however, did not change the character of his employment, for the employer himself still had general supervision and control over it.

The award is affirmed.

In Bank. Proceeding by Thomas Immel under the Workmen's Compensation Act against the Frankfort General Insurance Company. From an award allowing compensation, the Insurance Company brings certiorari against A. J. Pillsbury, Will J. French, and Harris Weinstock, as members of the State Industrial Accident Commission. Award affirmed.

Gavin McNab and Oliver B. Wyman, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Certiorari to review an award of the Accident Commission, allowing compensation to Thomas Immel for injuries received while in the employ of the American Beet Sugar Company. The petitioner is the insurance carrier, and was substituted for the employer. Immel was a carpenter and cabinetmaker and had been employed by the sugar company in its factory at Oxnard for some years. His injury consisted in the loss of the greater part of the index finger of the left hand. That the facts proven and found make out a case of liability under the terms of the act is not questioned. The main controversy turns on the amount of the award. The case is one of partial permanent disability. The Commission found that the percentage of disability was 20¼ per cent. and, in accordance with the provisions of section 15, (b) 2, (6), and (7), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, made an award of 65 per cent. of Immel's average weekly earnings for a period of 81 weeks. The average weekly earnings were found to be $23.55 and the total amount of the award was $1,239.30. The proceeding was twice heard by the Commission, a rehearing having been granted after the first award. Following the rehearing the original award was confirmed. Upon the first hearing the application was submitted upon a written stipulation of the parties. This stipulation stated, among other things, that Immel was 65 years of age; that in consequence of the injury his finger had been amputated between the knuckle and the proximal joint; that he had returned to work 26 days after the accident, having lost 20 days of working time. The stipulation further stated:

"That his main trouble through the loss of the finger is that he has not yet become used to using his second finger to pick up small things instead of the first finger. That so far as he knows he is able to do as much work as he did before he was hurt, in the course of a day's work. That there is no difference in the quality of his work since he was hurt, and that he does just as good work as he did before he lost the finger. That the only trouble he has at this time is that the stump pains him at times and is tender, and, as stated before, that he has some difficulty in picking up small articles. That he receives 40 cents an hour, which is the same rate at which he was paid before he was hurt."

The return shows that the Commission has had prepared for its guidance in cases of partial disability a "schedule for rating permanent disability," and that this schedule, which is not set forth in the record, is taken by the Commission as furnishing a prima facie guide in determining the percentage of disability. It was apparently so used in this case.

There is no occasion to give particular attention to the proceedings upon the first hearing, since a rehearing was granted and the final award was based upon the showing subsequently made.

[1-4] It is argued that the finding that the disability amounted to 20¼ per cent. is contrary to the evidence, in that it conflicts with the facts admitted by the stipulation of the parties, and great stress is laid upon the fact that this stipulation declares that Immel was able to do as much and as good work after as before the accident. But under the act the Commission is not bound to make its award upon the basis of the stipulation alone. Section 24, subdivision "b," after authorizing the parties to stipulate to the facts, declares that:

"The Commission may thereupon make its findings and award based upon such stipulation, or may in its discretion set the matter down for hearing and take such further testimony or make such further investigations as may be necessary to enable it to completely determine the matter in controversy."

In this case further testimony was taken. The ability of the workman to do the exact work for which he had been employed at the time of the injury is not the sole measure of disability.

"In determining the percentages of permanent disability, account shall be taken of the nature of the physical injury or disfigurement, the occupation of the injured employé and his age at the time of such injury." Workmen's Comp Act, § 15, subd. 2 (7).

Even if it be conceded that the facts stipulated may not be controverted, the evidence tended to show that Immel's ability to do some lines of work incident to his trade as carpenter and cabinetmaker would be seriously impaired by his injury. Furthermore, the Commission was, under the provision last quoted, authorized to take into account the nature of the physical injury or disfigurement and the workman's age. The circumstance that he was 65 years of age, and therefore less able than a younger man to adapt himself to new conditions, was developed in the testimony, and was a proper matter for consideration. The extent of disability occasioned by an injury is not capable of exact measurement. The percentage of such disability is a matter to be determined by the Commission in the exercise of its sound discretion, based upon a fair view of all of the circumstances. Its conclusion on this matter is the determination of a question of fact, and is not subject to review by the courts unless palpably contrary to the undisputed evidence. We cannot say that the finding that Immel's injury caused a permanent disability of 20¼ per cent. is contrary to the evidence.

[5] The petitioner claims that the Commission improperly computed the average weekly earnings of the applicant. It appears from the stipulation that Immel was paid at the rate of 40 cents per hour, and that he was working 6 days a week at the time of the injury. During the year preceding his injury he had earned $1,155.20. Section 17a of the act provides as follows:

"The average weekly earnings referred to in section fifteen hereof shall be one fifty-second of the average annual earnings of the employé; in computing such earnings his average annual earnings shall be taken at not less than three hundred and thirty-three dollars and thirty-three cents, nor at more than one thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents and between said limits shall be arrived at as follows:

"(1) If the injured employé has worked in the same employment, whether for the same employer or not, during substantially the whole of the year immediately preceding his injury, his average annual earnings shall consist of three hundred times the average daily earnings, wage or salary which he earned as such employé during the days when so employed."

The Commission arrived at the average daily earnings by dividing $1,155.20, Immel's total earnings for the preceding year, by 283, the number of days during which he actually worked. The petitioner contends that the average daily earnings should have been computed by dividing his earnings for the year by 312, the number of working days in the year. Section 17a (1) bases the annual earnings upon the average daily earnings "which he earned as such employé during the days when so employed." The petitioner argues that "the days when so employed" means the number of working days during which he might have worked or might have been expected to work. The respondents, on the other hand, claim that the phrase refers to the number of days during which the employé was actually engaged in work. We think the latter is the fair and reasonable interpretation of the language used. The basis of computation is the individual day upon which the workman is employed in the year during which he may have been in the employment. For this purpose each day stands by itself, and his average daily wage is the average for the year, figuring the number of days on which he earned wages. To the argument that this would produce an unjust result where the employé worked only 2 or 3 days a week, it may be said that the provision of the statute deals only with cases where the employé has worked "during substantially the whole of the year." It may well be questioned whether an employment which falls far short of the normal number of working days is an employment during substantially the whole of a given period.

The Commission found the ultimate facts in controversy. It was not required to make specific findings upon probative matters. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 705, 151 Pac. 398.

[6] After the Commission had granted a rehearing, it appointed a referee to take testimony. At the hearing before this referee, one of the witnesses called was an employé of the Commission whose duties were connected with the "permanent disability rating department" of the Commission. This witness, after testifying that he had assisted in compiling the "schedule for rating permanent disabilities" above referred to, was asked regarding inquiries made by him in reaching his conclusions regarding the percentage of disability in a case like the one before us. He testified that he had questioned many contractors and carpenters, and had obtained certain information from them. The referee declined to permit the petitioner to draw from the witness, on cross-examination, the names of the persons whom he had questioned. This ruling is made a ground of attack upon the award. Without in any way approving the action of the referee in thus restricting the cross-examination, we think the objection made is not available in the present proceeding. The refusal to permit certain questions to be answered is a mere error in the taking of testimony. Such errors cannot be reached by a writ of certiorari. The act itself (section 77) provides that the Commission and referees appointed by it shall not be bound by the technical rules of evidence, and that:

"No informality in any proceeding or in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any order, decision, award, rule or regulation made, approved or confirmed by the Commission."

The grounds of review specified in section 84 of the act do not include matters like the one under discussion.

Counsel for petitioner have raised certain constitutional objections to the Workmen's Compensation Act, but in view of our recent decisions these matters do not require particular notice.

The award is affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 10, 1916.)

1. QUIETING TITLE §44(2)—EVIDENCE—TAX DEEDS—ADMISSIBILITY.

In suit to quiet title, since defendant may effectually resist decree against himself by showing plaintiff to be without title, a city ordinance, certificate of sale, and tax deed under which he claims are admissible.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §980(3)—TAXATION—TAX SALES—PROCEEDINGS—FORMAL ERRORS—EFFECT.

Bakersfield Ordinance No. 9, § 71, substantially following Pol. Code, § 3776, provides that certificate of tax sale shall specify when the city shall be entitled to a deed. Sections 73, 75, following Pol. Code, § 3780, and sections 3785, 3786 (before amended by Acts 1911, p. 1102), declare that the city shall not be entitled to a deed until expiration of the five-year period of redemption, and that the deed must contain a statement of the time when the right of redemption has expired, and require that the matters recited in the certificate must be recited in the deed. The certificate recited that the sale was on December 28, 1898, and that the city would be entitled to a deed on December 28, 1903. The deed recited the same matters, except that the purchaser would be entitled to a deed on December 29, 1903. Held, that the proceedings subsequent to the certificate were void for the error in reciting December 28th as the time for deed, thus cutting off one redemption day.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Suit by Oscar L. Hinds against F. M. Clark. From a judgment for defendant and order denying motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment, and order reversed.

C. E. Arnold, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Geo. E. Whitaker and T. N. Harvey, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiff brought this action to quiet title to a parcel of land situated in the city of Bakersfield in Kern county. The case was tried by the court, a jury having been waived. Judgment was rendered for the defendant, decreeing that plaintiff had no interest in the land, and that the defendant was the owner thereof. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint is in the usual form, and alleges the ownership and title of the plaintiff in the land, his continuous possession thereof until four years prior to the commencement of the action, and that the defendant claims some lien, title, right, or interest therein adverse to that of the plaintiff. The defendant in his answer denied all the allegations of the complaint except as to his adverse claim, which he admitted, but denied that such claim was without any right or title. At the trial plaintiff proved that on October 16, 1889, Ida K. Hinds became the owner in fee simple of the property by a conveyance from one Tracy, and that she conveyed the property to plaintiff on January 27, 1903. The defendant then introduced in evidence an ordinance regulating the assessment of property in the city of Bakersfield and the collection of taxes thereon; a certificate of sale to the city for the nonpayment of the taxes for the year 1898 upon the land described in the complaint; a deed conveying the land to the city in pursuance of the provisions of the ordinance and bearing date, October 14, 1908; a deed, dated February 3, 1909, from the city to one Wilson; and a grant, bargain and sale deed in usual form from Wilson conveying the land to defendant Clark. The court found that the defendant was the absolute owner and entitled to the possession of the described property, and that plaintiff was not such owner, and made no other findings.

[1] 1. The appellant contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence the city ordinance, tax deeds, and certificate of sale for the reason that they were not specially pleaded. But this contention is without merit. It is well settled that in an action to quiet title the defendant may always effectually resist a decree against himself by simply showing that the plaintiff is without title. Sears v. Willard, 165 Cal. 12, 130 Pac. 869; Williams v. City of San Pedro et al., 153 Cal. 44, 94 Pac. 234; Hart v. All Persons, etc., 26 Cal. App. 664, 148 Pac. 236; Rogers v. Clark Iron Co., 104 Minn. 198, 116 N. W. 739. The denial of the allegations of the complaint placed the plaintiff's title in issue, and it was proper for the defendant, in order to negative such title, to introduce in evidence the city ordinance, and to attempt to show by means of the tax deeds, certificate of sale, and other evidence that in pursuance of such ordinance plaintiff had been completely divested of title.

[2] 2. The plaintiff's property was sold to the city on December 28, 1898. The certificate of the city treasurer, after reciting the date of the sale, contains the following statement:

"And I further certify that the said real estate last aforesaid was sold for taxes and subject to redemption pursuant to the statute and ordinances in such cases made and provided, and unless the said real estate is redeemed within five years from the date of sale to said city, the purchaser thereof will be entitled to a deed thereto on the 28th day of December, 1903."

It is provided in section 71 of the ordinance (Ordinance No. 9, of the City of Bakersfield, passed March 4, 1898, contained on p. 43 of Bk. of Ord.), which follows substantially the provisions of the Political Code (Pol. Code, § 3776), that the certificate of sale shall specify "when the city will be entitled to a deed." Other provisions of the ordinance declare, however, that the city shall not be entitled to a deed to the land until after the five-year period for the redemption of the property by the owner has expired. Ordinance, etc., §§ 73, 75. See Pol. Code, §§ 3780, 3785. In this case, it must be conceded that the period of redemption could not have expired until after the last minute of the 28th day of December, 1903, the end of the five years following the day of the sale. Regarding the form of the deed the ordinance provides that it must contain a statement of "the time when the right of redemption had expired" (Ordinance, etc., § 75. See Pol. Code, § 3785, before it was amended in 1911 [Stats. 1911, p. 1102]), and also declares that "the matters recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed" (Ordinance, etc., § 76. See Pol. Code, § 3786, before it was amended in 1911 [Stats. 1911, p. 1102]). That is to say, the deed must not only specify the time when the right of redemption did expire, but must recite the matter appearing in the certificate as to when the purchaser would be entitled to a deed. Of course, these events cannot occur upon the same day. In attempting to comply with these provisions of the ordinance, it is recited in the tax deed:

"The certificate of sale stated that unless the said real estate was redeemed within five years from the date of the sale to the said city, the purchaser thereof would be entitled to a deed thereof, on the 29th day of December, 1903; that said certificate bears date the 28th day of December, 1898; the day of said sale; and whereas, the time, to wit, five years, for redeeming said property, expired on the 28th day of December, 1903. * * *" (Italics are ours.)

The appellant contends that in thus correcting the error in the date appearing in the certificate the deed contains a false recital, and, in line with our decisions, such error must be regarded as fatal to the validity of the tax title. See Hughes v. Cannedy, 92 Cal. 382, 28 Pac. 573; Simmons v. McCarthy, 118 Cal. 622, 50 Pac. 761. But we do not find it necessary to consider whether the latter discrepancy is error, or if so, whether it is fatal to the defendant's alleged title to the land, as we are satisfied that the failure to correctly state in the certificate the time "when the city will be entitled to a deed" renders the certificate void, and annuls the subsequent proceedings.

[3] 3. It has been frequently reiterated that "where the statute prescribes the particular form of the tax deed, the form becomes substance, and must be strictly pursued, and it is not for the courts to inquire whether the required recitals are of material facts or otherwise." Henderson, etc., v. De Turk, 164 Cal. 296, 128 Pac. 747; Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 564, 89 Pac. 352; Preston v. Hirsch, 5 Cal. App. 485, 90 Pac. 965; Simmons v. McCarthy, supra. See, also, Jordan v. Beale, 155 Pac. 990. The identical question before us was presented in Stanton v. Hotchkiss, 157 Cal. 652, 108 Pac. 864, but, although error was conceded by the counsel, it was held to have been cured by the Curative Act of 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 63), the purpose of which was to confirm, validate and legalize certain tax deeds executed to the state. In other cases where the question was involved, substantially the same conclusions were reached. Baird v. Monroe, supra; Fox v. Townsend, 152 Cal. 51, 91 Pac. 1004, 1007; Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234, 239, 90 Pac. 936; Carter v. Osborn, 150 Cal. 620, 89 Pac. 608. It is suggested in these cases, however, but for the Curative Act such errors would render the tax proceedings defective, for "it is well settled that proceedings on tax sales are in invitum, and to be valid must be stricti juris." Preston v. Hirsch, supra. It has been said that notwithstanding these requirements of the law could not apparently "be of any substantial benefit to the property owner," the tax deed must be held void even though the ruling appear to be extremely technical. Baird v. Monroe, supra. But the error under consideration does seem to be material. It is declared in Bruschi v. Cooper et al., 22 Cal. App. Dec. 205, 213:

"One of the objects of the certificate doubtless is to give notice to the owner of the date of the sale and to inform him when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed, i. e., inform him of the period of redemption."

This purpose further appears from the fact that the ordinance expressly provides for the recordation of the certificate. Ord., etc., § 72. The respondent contends, however, that the recital in the certificate could not have misled the owner, as it specified that the purchaser would be entitled to a deed five years from the date of the sale (which is set forth correctly) unless sooner redeemed. Had the recital stopped at that point there would have been no error under the ruling of Best v. Wohlford, 153 Cal. 17, 94 Pac. 98. But it went on and declared the said time to be precisely the 28th day of December, 1903. We cannot agree with the respondent that the giving of the date itself may be regarded as "mere surplusage."

Considering this recital as of the time the certificate was given, it tends to inform the owner that the five-year period for the redemption of the property expires on December 27, 1903, and that the following day the purchaser shall be entitled to a deed. In effect, it gives notice that the period of redemption commences to run with the day of the sale contrary to the general provisions of the law. Civ. Code, § 10; Code Civ. Proc. § 12. To refer again to Baird v. Monroe, where a similar question was carefully considered although not expressly decided:

"The Legislature has seen fit, however, to require that the time shall be expressly stated in the deed, and that nothing in that regard shall be left to be determined from one's knowledge of the law."

We do not find that the cases relied upon by the respondent are opposed to this ruling. In Rollins v. Woodman, 117 Cal. 516, 49 Pac. 455, the time when the right of the purchaser to the deed became fixed was correctly given as the day following the time when the period of redemption expired. The case is authority for the point that it is immaterial that the day as specified happened to fall upon a Sunday. Deets v. Hall, 163 Cal. 249, 124 Pac. 1007, merely decides that it was not error to specify the time when the right of redemption expired as being one day later than the correct day, as the date designated in that instance "was perfectly correct, in that it named a date after the redemption had in fact expired," while the concurring opinion points out that the correct time "was at the infinitely small space of time between the two days." But to state that the purchaser shall be entitled to a deed at any time on the day preceding the correct day is to shorten the period of redemption to that extent and thus cause prejudice to the rights of the owner. In this connection we do not regard it as material that several years elapsed after the expiration of the period of redemption and before the plaintiff commenced this suit to quiet his title.

[4] 4. There is one other point which should be mentioned. Section 67 of the ordinance requires that notice of the sale of property for delinquent taxes be published, and that:

"The publication must designate the day and hour when the property will, by operation of law, be sold to the city * * * and the place shall be at the city hall."

The certificate of sale recites that the publication "did designate the place of said sale, which place so designated was at the city hall of the said city of Bakersfield." But it is urged by the appellant "that the notice of the place of the sale as simply city hall is an insufficient designation of the place of sale."

"From the notice," it is reasoned, "one would not be apprised * * * whether the sale would be made in the city hall, or in what particular part of it, or whether it would be made in front of it, or at its back or on either side."

It is manifestly the purpose of the law, in requiring notice of the sale to be published, to furnish definite information as to the precise location where it will be held. In this way the owner has notice where to go in order to arrest the sale by the payment of the taxes, and other interested persons are given full opportunity to participate in the sale. Cooley on Taxation, vol. II (3d Ed.) p. 938; Blackwell on Tax Titles, vol. I (5th Ed.) § 501. But it cannot be said, as matter of law, that the designation of the city hall as the place of sale was indefinite or uncertain. The sufficiency of the notice, in this regard, must depend upon the circumstances of each case. No evidence was offered herein descriptive of the city hall building. For aught that appears, at the time of the sale it may have consisted of a single room in a one-story structure of limited dimensions. If that were so, clearly the notice would have been sufficient. It is shown by the record that in 1898, the year of the sale, the city of Bakersfield was organized as a municipal corporation of the fifth class. The United States census shows that Bakersfield had a population in 1890 of 2,626. Possibly the population, when the sale was made eight years later, did not exceed 3,000, the minimum population required for cities of the fifth class by the Municipal Corporation Act. Stats. 1897, p. 421. But we cannot hold that notice of the sale to take place at the city hall of such a municipality was not sufficiently definite to meet the purposes and requirements of the statute.

Since it must, for the reasons given, be held that the certificate of sale to the city is fatally defective, thereby rendering the deed invalid, it will not therefore be necessary to consider the numerous objections made by the appellant to the deed from the city to Wilson touching the absence of proper recitals and the failure, in essential particulars, to otherwise comply with the provisions of the ordinance.

Judgment and order reversed.

1. CORPORATIONS — 216—STOCKHOLDER'S LIABILITY—MATTERS DETERMINING.

As a general rule, the liability of a stockholder for the debts of his corporation is determined by the charter of the company and the

2. CORPORATIONS ¶216—STOCKHOLDER'S LIABILITY — LIABILITY IN JURISDICTION WHERE BUSINESS IS DONE.

The liability of a stockholder for the corporation's debts, according to the laws of the jurisdiction in which business is transacted by the company, rests upon the stockholder's consent to be bound by such laws, which is inferred from the fact that by his act of becoming a stockholder he has authorized the governing officers of the corporation to transact business in such state.

3. CORPORATIONS ¶216—STOCKHOLDER'S LIABILITY—GENERAL AUTHORIZATION TO DO BUSINESS IN ANY STATE.

A stockholder who became such in a company whose articles authorized it to do business in "any other state or territory, as the board of directors may deem necessary or expedient," empowered them to engage in business anywhere, and impliedly consented that when they selected a place for the transaction of corporate business, they should have power to bind him so far as the laws of that place might require, so as to subject him to liability for the company's debts.

4. PLEADING ¶126—ANSWER—INSUFFICIENT DENIALS.

In an action against a corporate stockholder to enforce his liability for the company's debts, where the complaint alleged that at the time the liability was incurred the total subscribed stock of the company was 19,159 shares, answers undertaking to deny "that at the time of entering into said alleged contract the total amount of stock * * * then subscribed for was 19,159 shares," were not good traverses being evasive, and admitted the allegation of the complaint.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by the Provident Gold Mining Company against Lloyd C. Haynes and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendants appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Thomas C. Job and Joseph E. Hannon, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. Robert Young, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an action to enforce the liability of the defendants as stockholders of the Manhattan Securities Company, an Arizona corporation. The liability asserted arose out of the alleged failure of the Manhattan Securities Company to comply with a contract whereby it had agreed to purchase certain shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff. The court entered judgment against the respective defendants, each of whom appeals from said judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The appellants claim that the agreement between the two corporations, Provident Gold Mining Company and Manhattan Securities Company, did not bind the latter to purchase any shares of stock, but merely vested in it an option to make such purchase. But, since the taking of the present appeals, this court has had occasion, in another case, to construe the same agreement, and has held that it was a binding contract of purchase and sale. Provident Gold Min. Co. v. Manhattan Securities Co., 168 Cal. 304, 142 Pac. 884.

The main question for decision is whether the defendants are liable, in accordance with the law of California, for a proportion of this obligation of the Securities Company, a corporation organized in Arizona. Under the law of this state, as declared in our Constitution and statutes, every stockholder of a corporation is individually liable for such proportion of its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock of the shares of the corporation. Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322. Our Constitution further provides that no corporation organized without the state shall be allowed to transact business within the state on more favorable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of this state. Const. art. 12, § 15. Section 322 of the Civil Code declares specifically that the liability of each stockholder of a corporation formed outside of this state and doing business within this state is the same as the liability of a stockholder of a California corporation.

The law of Arizona, under which the Manhattan Securities Company was organized, gives to corporations the power, among other things, "to exempt the private property of the members from liability for corporate debts." The articles of incorporation must, under the Arizona statutes, state "whether private property is to be exempt from corporate debts." The articles of incorporation of the Manhattan Securities Company contain this provision:

"The private property of every stockholder in this corporation shall be forever exempt from liability for the corporate debts of the corporation."

Said articles declare, further, that the principal place of business of the corporation is to be at Phoenix, Ariz., and that:

"Branch offices may be established and the corporation may carry on business in such other places within the territory of Arizona or in any other state or territory as the board of directors may from time to time deem necessary and expedient."

The purposes for which the corporation was formed, as declared in the articles, were very broad and included the purchase, the leasing, or other acquisition of mines, mining rights, and land and any interest therein in any state or territory of the United States and in any foreign country.

As indicated by its name, the plaintiff was engaged in the business of mining. The purchase of its stock was within the corporate purposes of the Manhattan Securities Company. The contract which gave rise to the liability here sued upon was made in this state. The court found, and the finding is not attacked, that, prior to and at the time of the making of such contract, the Manhattan Securities Company was transacting business in this state and had a place of business and office in the city of Los Angeles.

[1] As a general rule, "the liability of a stockholder is determined by the charter of the corporation and the laws of the state in which the incorporation is had." Pinney v. Nelson, 183 U. S. 144, 146, 22 Sup. Ct. 52, 46 L. Ed. 125. It has, however, been held in a series of cases that where a corporation is formed in some state or country other than California, for the purpose of doing business in this state, the stockholders are, so far as concerns business transacted in California, to be held liable in accordance with the California statutes. Pinney v. Nelson, supra; Peck v. Noe, 154 Cal. 351, 97 Pac. 865; Thomas v. Wentworth Hotel Co., 158 Cal. 275, 110 Pac. 942, 139 Am. St. Rep. 120; Thomas v. Matthiessen, 232 U. S. 221, 34 Sup. Ct. 312, 58 L. Ed. 577. The first in this line of cases was Pinney v. Nelson, and the ground of that decision, as of those following it, is that the stockholders, in forming a corporation for the purpose of doing business in a particular state (e. g., California), must be deemed to have contracted with reference to the laws of that state, and will, so far as concerns business transacted therein, be held to the liabilities which those laws impose upon the transaction of such business. In Pinney v. Nelson, the corporation in question was organized in the state of Colorado under articles which declared that the principal plant and operations of the company beyond the limits of the state of Colorado should be in Los Angeles county, state of California. In Peck v. Noe, the corporation had been organized in Nevada, and the articles of incorporation declared (as this court construed the findings) that it was the purpose of the corporation to do business in California. In Thomas v. Wentworth Hotel Co., the corporation had been formed in Arizona, and the articles declared that the principal place of business outside of Arizona should be in the city of Los Angeles or the city of Pasadena, in the state of California. The case of Thomas v. Matthiessen had to do with the liability of stockholders in the same corporation which was involved in Thomas v. Wentworth Hotel Co., and in the Matthiessen Case the liability was enforced outside of this state against a stockholder residing in the state of New York.

[2, 3] In each of these cases, the articles of incorporation contained language showing the purpose of transacting business in the state of California. In the case now before us, there is no such specific reference, the articles declaring merely that the corporation shall have authority to transact business in such places in Arizona or in "any other state or territory as the board of directors may deem necessary or expedient." We think, however, that this distinction does not, in principle, justify the application of any different rule. The liability of a stockholder, according to the laws of the jurisdiction in which business is transacted, rests upon his consent to be bound by such laws. His consent is inferred from the fact that he has, by his act of becoming a stockholder, authorized the governing officers of the corporation to transact business in such state. Where he becomes a stockholder in a corporation whose articles authorize it to do business in any state or country which its directors may select, he empowers the directors to engage in business anywhere, and impliedly consents that, when they select a place for the transaction of corporate business, they shall have power to bind him so far as the laws of that place may require. The test of liability is whether the stockholder has authorized the corporation and its managing officers to bind him by entering upon the transaction of business in a given state. Such authority is conferred as well by general language authorizing the transaction of business in any state which the directors may deem it expedient to enter as by words empowering them to transact business in a specific place. Any other holding would make it easy for corporators, designing to conduct the corporate business in California, to escape the liabilities imposed by our law through the simple expedient of using, in their articles, general instead of specific words in defining the purposes of the corporation and the places of intended operation.

[4] One other point is made. The liability of the stockholder is measured by the proportion which his stock bears to the total subscribed stock of the corporation. The amount of such total subscribed stock must therefore be shown. The complaint alleges that at the time the liability was incurred the total subscribed stock of the Manhattan Securities Company was 19,159 shares. A finding in accordance with this allegation is attacked as unsupported by the evidence. The answers of appellants did not, however, raise an issue on the point. Each of the answers undertook to deny "that at the time of entering into said alleged contract the total amount of stock of said Manhattan Securities Company then subscribed for was 19,159 shares." Without regard to other objections to the pleadings, these answers are evasive. They deny, merely, that the amount of stock subscribed was the specified number of shares alleged in the complaint. The number may, consistently with the truth of the denial, have been 19,160 shares or any number other than 19,159. Such a denial is not a good traverse, and the allegation of the complaint stands admitted. Towdy v. Ellis, 22 Cal. 650, 659; Doll v. Good, 38 Cal. 287; Marsters v. Lash, 61 Cal. 622; Westbay v. Gray, 116 Cal. 660, 48 Pac. 800. The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Aalwyns Law Institute against Peter D. Martin and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur Crane, of San Francisco, for appellant. Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, Corbet & Selby, Cooper, Gray & Cooper, Stratton, Kaufman & Torchiana, McCutchen, Olney & Willard, Alfred Sutro, and Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, all of San Francisco (Peter F. Dunne, W. H. Smith, Jr., Charles A. Gray, W. W. Kaufman, and A. Crawford Greene, all of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered after an order sustaining demurrers of all of the defendants to the fourth amended complaint.

The suit is one to quiet title. It is alleged in the complaint that Ocean Shore Railway Company was a corporation; that its charter was declared forfeited for nonpayment of license tax on November 30, 1910; that on the date of the forfeiture the defendants Martin, Moore, Harvey, Folger, and Pillsbury constituted the board of directors of the corporation, and by the forfeiture became "trustees of said corporation"; and that plaintiff is the owner and holder of 12 shares of the "capital stock of said corporation."

It is next alleged that said Ocean Shore Railway Company "is, and for a long time hitherto has been," the owner in fee simple and entitled to the possession of all that real property situated in the city and county of San Francisco and in the counties of San Mateo and Santa Cruz, and (to quote directly from the pleading)—

"more particularly described as follows, to wit: Rights of way, terminal lands, and all the property known as the 'Ocean Shore Railway property,' more particularly described in the public records of said city and county of San Francisco in Liber 62 of Mortgages, page 29 et seq., and to which reference is hereby made for said description."

This is followed by the averment that the defendants assert individual interests in said property adverse to the Ocean Shore Railway Company, but that their claims are without right, and that the five persons named as trustees have no title nor interest in the property except as such trustees. It is averred on information and belief that defendants individually claim adverse interests in the property "pursuant to a scheme and plan among themselves to go through the form of buying and selling" it, stating and publishing that they were empowered to do so by the company's stockholders, bondholders, and creditors; that said assumption is false; that in pursuance of said scheme they did on December 4, 1911, connive and acquiesce in the execution of a deed of said property given without consideration by defendant Moore, which purported to convey the said property from said Moore to the Ocean Shore Railroad Company; and that said deed was executed and recorded only for the purpose of giving color to the adverse claims of defendants, which were without any right whatever. Plaintiff further alleges that on February 15, 1911, it became and ever since has been "a stockholder as aforesaid in said Ocean Shore Railway Company"; that immediately prior to the commencement of this action the trustees of the Ocean Shore Railway Company were asked to bring suit in their representative capacity to quiet the title of said corporation to said property and to set aside the fraudulent deed of December 4, 1911; but that they refused to do so, and plaintiff and the other stockholders are without remedy save in a court of equity.

There is a general averment that plaintiff for lack of information cannot be more specific and certain as to dates, names, places, amounts, or other matters, but that all such things are within the actual knowledge of defendants.

The prayer is that defendants may be required to set forth the nature of their several claims, and that the court decree said claims to be without merit, and that it be adjudged that the Ocean Shore Railway Company is the owner of the property, and that the other defendants and each of them be debarred from asserting any claim to the premises. Although there is a general averment that plaintiff owns certain shares of the capital stock of the Ocean Shore Railway Company, there is a special allegation that plaintiff became a stockholder in said company on February 15, 1911, a time subsequent to the forfeiture of the charter of said corporation. It follows that whatever interest plaintiff may have, if any, is equitable, and not such as is derived from the sale of the stock of a going corporation. But, before discussing plaintiff's standing as an alleged "stockholder," we will notice the description of the property to which plaintiff seeks to have the title of the Ocean Shore Railway Company quieted.

It is the contention of respondents that there is in reality no description of the land. The attempted description is of "rights of way, terminal lands, and all the property known as 'Ocean Shore Railway property,' more particularly described," etc., giving the volume and number of a page of the public records. Appellant asserts that this is a good description, but, if it be insufficient, it is vulnerable only for uncertainty, and will not fall before a general demurrer. Both of these contentions are incorrect. There is no description of the rights of way and terminal lands at all, while the other property is vaguely designated as that "known as the 'Ocean Shore Railway property.'" It is a general rule of pleading that a complaint in an action to quiet title must contain a pertinent description of the land in controversy. The court, passing upon the demurrer from the face of the pleading itself, could not possibly determine the location of the property unless recourse were had to the book of records indicated, and this could not be required of the court. To be sure "Ocean Shore Railway property" is given as a common designation of a part of the realty to which plaintiff seeks to quiet the title, but this does not bring the pleading within the rule of those cases where a well-known tract of land is described by name and by the enumeration of some other identifying characteristics, and the whole description aided by reference to the public records. There must be something in the pleading itself by way of actual description. 32 Cyc. 1355. Appellant cites a number of cases in which descriptions of land have been held sufficient when supported and explained by reference to public records or maps. Courts have shown great liberality in permitting pleaders to set forth very general descriptions which may be made more certain by reference to indicated records, but we know of no authority in which a pleading has been tolerated which attempted no description possible of any sort of identification without reference to a record. For example, in Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 261, 22 Pac. 195, the description in the deed indicated the acreage, the county, the common name of the tract, and the names of some of the previous grantors and grantees, and finally referred for greater certainty to a deed of record in a specified county. In Redd v. Murry, 95 Cal. 48, 24 Pac. 841, 30 Pac. 132, the property involved was described by metes and bounds and as being within a certain city. A map was also mentioned in the description, and the court properly held such map admissible in evidence. In Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 187, 190, 23 Pac. 361, the description attacked by appellant was based upon a known natural monument coupled with measurements and direction of lines. The description discussed in the opinion of Joyce v. Tomasini, 168 Cal. 234, 238, 142 Pac. 67, gave the number of acres and the names of the owners of the encompassing tracts of land.

It is impossible to tell from the face of the pleading whether or not the public record to which reference is made includes within the property described in a mortgage all of that mentioned in the pleading as "rights of way," "terminal lands," and the "Ocean Shore Railway property," or only that last named. This is not mere ambiguity to be attacked only by special demurrer. It is a failure of description, and is vulnerable to a general demurrer. The pleading is to be construed most strongly against the pleader, and this complaint is entirely susceptible of an interpretation which would describe the "rights of way" and "terminal lands" as somewhere in one of the two counties or in the city and county mentioned and the "Ocean Shore Railway property," vaguely located somewhere within the same vast territory, but described particularly in a public record. Such pleading is too vague to be dignified as mere incomplete description.

[1, 2] When a corporation has failed to pay its license tax, and a forfeiture of its charter has been declared, it ceases to be a corporation. Newhall v. Western Zinc Mining Co., 164 Cal. 380, 128 Pac. 1040. The title to the property formerly owned by the corporation vests in the former directors as trustees. The complaint in the case at bar does not seek to have the title of the trustees quieted, but, on the contrary, asks that the title of the Ocean Shore Railway Company be quieted, and the whole action is based upon the alleged ownership of the property by the said company. But the company is dead and may not own property. Even if we concede the plaintiff's capacity to sue he is seeking relief upon a false theory and a general demurrer to his complaint will lie. If he were entitled to any relief at all it would be to have the title of the trustees quieted, but for this he has not prayed and his complaint is based upon the false theory that the defunct corporation may hold property.

[3, 4] Although plaintiff avers generally that it is a stockholder, it appears by its special allegation that its interest was acquired after the dissolution of the corporation. Therefore, as we have seen, at most it is the owner of an equitable interest in the assets of the defunct corporation. It appears that a deed to the Ocean Shore Railroad Company has been executed by Mr. Moore, one of the trustees. Plaintiff could do no more than seek to have the last-named corporation declared a trustee for the true owners or to have the deed set aside in the interest of the trustees who by operation of law were made custodians and holders of the property of the dead corporation. An action to quiet title is not the proper remedy for the owner of an equitable interest to invoke against the owner of the legal title. Chase v. Cameron, 133 Cal. 231, 65 Pac. 460.

[5] Appellant insists that the cited authority announces a rule which is unconstitutional because its application would take away his property from the owner of an equitable interest without due process of law. We cannot see that this follows. The reason for the rule announced in Chase v. Cameron, supra, is that if the owner of equities could sue to quiet title he might obtain a judgment based upon his adversary's fraud without setting up in his pleadings the facts constituting such fraud. This would be manifestly unfair. Burris v. Adams, 96 Cal. 644, 667, 31 Pac. 565; McDonald v. McCoy, 121 Cal. 55, 71, 53 Pac. 421. He may effectively protect his equities in other ways. The law's refusal to permit him to sue for the quieting of a legal title not his own does not deprive him of property without due process of law.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the judgment on the grounds discussed in the last two paragraphs of the opinion of Justice MELVIN. I also concur in the views of Justice SLOSS.

SLOSS, J. I concur in the judgment. The complaint, read as a whole, shows that the only defendant asserting an interest in the property is the Ocean Shore Railroad Company. No cause of action is therefore alleged against any other defendant.

[6] As against the Ocean Shore Railroad Company, the complaint alleges that it claims title under an unauthorized or fraudulent transfer from the trustees of the Ocean Shore Railway Company. The plaintiff, as a stockholder of the latter corporation, seeks to avoid this transfer. But the complaint shows affirmatively that the Ocean Shore Railway Company had been dissolved before plaintiff's connection with it began. It is not alleged that plaintiff was a stockholder of record, and in view of the status of the corporation when plaintiff acquired its interest it could not have become such. 2 Cook on Corp. (6th Ed.) § 641; Muir v. Cit. Nat. Bk., 39 Wash. 57, 80 Pac. 1007. Only a stockholder of record can maintain an action like the one here sought to be stated. Brown v. Duluth M. & N. R. Co. (C. C.) 53 Fed. 889; Hodge v. U. S. Steel Corp., 64 N. J. Eq. 90, 53 Atl. 601. The demurrer of the Ocean Shore Railroad Company also was therefore properly sustained.

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS $\Leftrightarrow$ 202—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—UNLAWFUL NATURE OF ACT—“WILLFULLY AND UNLAWFULLY.”

A complaint that defendant “willfully and unlawfully” transported intoxicating liquors sufficiently charges a wrongful intent.

In Bank. Application for a writ of habeas corpus by M. B. Ahart, in custody under a charge of violating a liquor ordinance. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

H. N. Wells, of Covina, and Robert P. Jennings, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. A. M. Pence and Gail & Pence, all of Covina, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner was arrested for violating the terms of the liquor ordinance of the town of Covina. He sued for and obtained this writ of habeas corpus under his contention that the ordinance is void, and that consequently the criminal complaint against him, founded upon that ordinance, is likewise void. The ordinance forbids the sale or dispensing of alcoholic liquors, saving in designated places and under prescribed restrictions, and then in section 5 declares that:

“Every person who * * * transports within the city of Covina, spirituous, or vinous, or malt, or mixed, liquors or intoxicating drinks, or vessels for containing the same, to any place, the establishing or keeping of which is prohibited by this ordinance * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.”

The complaint against this defendant was framed under this provision of the ordinance, and specifically charged him with “willfully and unlawfully” transporting such intoxicants to an inhibited place. Petitioner does not question but that the intentional transportation to such a place by one knowing the character of it, which intentional transportation may thus be considered to be in aid of the conduct of the illicit and prohibited business, can be denounced as a crime. His contention, argued with great earnestness and presented in many different forms, is that this ordinance has not done that thing, but has attempted to make criminal acts which any person may do under the sanction and protection of the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the state of California. Herein it is pointed out that the ordinance itself would make guilty of crime any innocent person who, without knowledge of the character of the place and without intent to violate the law, innocently and in ignorance of the character of the place transported to it forbidden liquors; that thus a common carrier would subject itself to punishment, as would also the innocent driver of any delivery wagon who would be called upon to leave intoxicants at such a place even though he knew not the character of the place, nor that the package which he was called upon to deliver contained intoxicants.

[1-3] It is true that the ordinance does not in terms base its punishment upon the knowledge of the defendant of the character of the place, coupled with the intent which may be inferred from the act of delivery when he possesses such knowledge. But we are not greatly concerned with this situation, and need say no more than that if this law deliberately made it a crime for the doing of such an act innocently performed, it would indeed be a harsh one. We say that we are not deeply concerned because the construction which we put upon this ordinance does not compel this harsh construction. It is true that there are some acts made crimes by the very terms of the law where the fraudulent or wicked intent is conclusively presumed from the commission of the act itself, or where the act is denounced as criminal without regard to the facinorous intent (2 Wharton's Crim. Ev. [8th Ed.] § 1695; People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 31 Pac. 45), but upon the other hand, whether a criminal intent or a guilty knowledge is a necessary ingredient of a statutory offense is often a matter of construction (Commonwealth v. Weiss, 139 Pa. 251, 21 Atl. 10, 11 L. R. A. 530, 23 Am. St. Rep. 182), and when a criminal statute is thus open to construction two fundamental principles lie at the very threshold of the inquiry into it. The first of these principles is that the law will be upheld unless it be clearly obnoxious, and the other is that of two permissible constructions that one under which the law is valid will be adopted as expressing the intent of the legislative body.

[4] Therefore, we do not construe section 5 of the Covina ordinance as designed to inflict punishment upon an innocent person who shall so transport intoxicants. The case comes quite clearly within the reasoning and principle of the English case of Regina v. Tolson (L. R. 23 W. B. Div. 168 [1889], s. c. 40 Alb. L. J. 250), which case itself receives detailed consideration in 2 Lewis' Sutherland Statutory Construction, § 527. The case was a criminal charge against a woman for a bigamous marriage. It has been held that one who marries a second time under an honest but an erroneous belief that a decree of divorce which had been granted was valid is afforded no protection by the invalid decree, and that evidence of his good faith will be excluded. 2 Wharton's Crim. Ev. (8th Ed.) § 1695a. But in the later Tolson Case the woman had married five years, instead of seven years, after her husband's desertion of her, under the belief held in good faith that her husband was dead. The proposition considered was whether honest belief and good faith constituted a defense. It was conceded that the prisoner “falls within the very words of the statute.” Cave, J., said:

“At common law an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of circumstances, which, if true, would make the act for which the person is indicted an innocent act, has always been held to be a good defense. * * * So far as I am aware it has never been suggested that these exceptions do not equally apply to the case of statutory offenses unless they are excluded expressly or by necessary implication."

Placing the ordinance under this construction, it may be given one of two interpretations, either of which confirms its validity. The first of these is that the law does in general terms denounce the transportation to an inhibited place without making the wrongful intent a declared ingredient of the crime, but always, as in Regina v. Tolson, making the innocent state of mind of the defendant a complete defense. The second construction to which we incline is that the law intends to denounce the act only when accompanied by some evidence of the wrongful intent. Under either of these, as has been said, the ordinance is not invalid.

[5] Turning next to the complaint. It alleges that the defendant "willfully and unlawfully" transported the intoxicants. "Willfully" of course, imports no more than a design to do the specific act. But the charge is also that the act of transportation was unlawfully performed. This employment of the word is not merely epithetical, but is sufficient to charge the defendant with the performance of this act with a wrongful intent, and is thus sufficient to justify his being placed upon trial.

The writ is therefore discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

BROOKLYN MINING CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA. (L. A. 4277.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1916.)

MASTER AND SERVANT § 380—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—"WILLFUL MISCONDUCT."

Where a miner working in a shaft was instructed by his foreman to complete his work there and then go to another shaft, where the foreman was, and to work there, and, after completing his work in the first shaft, came to the surface, and, the day being exceedingly warm, stopped temporarily to rest in the shade of an ore bin, and while so resting was killed by the collapse of the bin, and where the foreman had been informed that he had finished the work in the first shaft and was waiting for another assignment to work, the act of the deceased in resting was not "willful misconduct," within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1913, p. 283) § 12, subd. 3, barring a right to indemnification.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 380.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Willful Misconduct.]

In Bank. Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act to obtain compensation for the death of Charles Fremont Goering, opposed by Brooklyn Mining Company and others, employers. Compensation was awarded, and the employers petition for a writ of review against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California. Writ of review discharged.

Byron Waters and McNabb, Hartzell & Hodge, all of San Bernardino, and Holcomb & Coy, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The writ of review was issued in this case for the consideration of constitutional objections urged against the validity of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act. All of those constitutional questions have been considered and disposed of in the opinion of this court in Western Indemnity Company v. Pillsbury et al., 151 Pac. 398.

Nothing remains saving one last contention of the petitioners, which is to the effect that the admitted facts attending the death of Charles Fremont Goering established that he met his death under circumstances which under the terms of the act deprive his widow of the right to any award. The facts are that Goering was employed as a miner working in one of the shafts of a mine belonging to the petitioners. He had been instructed by the foreman to complete his work in the shaft and then go to another shaft, where the foreman was located, and work there. He came to the surface of the ground after completing his work in the shaft. The day was insufferably hot, and he stopped temporarily to rest in the shade of an ore bin, a place quite commonly frequented by the men for this purpose. While so resting the bin collapsed and killed him. Under the circumstances of the case, considering the fact that word had been sent or at least carried to the foreman that he had finished his underground labors and was waiting for another assignment to work, and considering also the additional fact that the shade of the ore bin was a common place for the men to recuperate from the intense heat, that the bin was regarded as a safe structure, and that no one had ever warned any of the men against resting under it, it is quite apparent that the act of the deceased in making it a place of temporary rest and recuperation was not the "willful misconduct" of the law (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 12, subd. 3) barring a right of indemnification.

The writ of review is therefore discharged.

BROWN et al. v. DOMESTIC UTILITIES MFG. CO. et al. (L. A. 3377.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1916.)

1. SALES — FRAUD — WAIVER — NEW AGREEMENT.

Where a buyer aware of a fraud perpetrated upon him suggests, if he does not demand, a rescission, and on its refusal enters into a new and modified agreement covering the subject-matter of the first contract, the new agreement waives the fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 109-114; Dec. Dig. —50.]

2. SALES — FRAUD — WAIVER — INDUCEMENT.

Such buyer would be relieved from the legal effect of the waiver only by pleading and proof that he was induced to enter into the new agreement by undue influence, fraud, or mistake, or that the terms of such agreement were not lived up to by the defendant; as in such case the right to sue in an action based on the original fraud would be restored or revived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 109-114; Dec. Dig. —50.]

3. SALES — FRAUD — RESCISSION — DELAY.

Where the buyer discovered facts constituting the seller's alleged fraud in January, 1911, and did not attempt to rescind the contract until January, 1912, the inexcusable delay was fatal to his action to enforce a rescission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 313, 315; Dec. Dig. —126(1).]

4. SALES — FRAUD — RESCISSION — UNDUPLICATE INFLUENCE.

Where it appeared that plaintiffs were adult persons, familiar with the English language, and able to understand ordinary business transactions, and that there was no relation of confidence between the parties, there was nothing from which the finding of undue influence excusing the delay within the exceptions of Civ. Code, § 1691, could be made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. —126(3).]

5. SALES — CONTRACT — RESCISSION — DEMAND.

Though the contract received by the buyer of washing machines was of no value, he was not thereby excused from making his demand for rescission seasonably, which would give notice to the seller that he had decided to rescind.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by C. S. Brown and another against the Domestic Utilities Manufacturing Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, motion for new trial denied, and defendants appeal. Judgment and order reversed.

Davis, Kemp & Post, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Parker & Moote and Arthur C. Vaughan, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. A hearing before this court in the matter of the above appeal was ordered, after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, reversing the judgment of the trial court, which was in favor of the plaintiffs.

The frauds perpetrated by defendants and appellants upon these plaintiffs, which frauds were established by the evidence and found by the court, were so gross that equity would lend all of its legitimate powers to relieve plaintiffs from the effect of them. It was because the trial court had decreed that such relief should be granted and the Court of Appeals had determined that in the state of the record it could not be granted that this court assumed jurisdiction of the case to resolve this question, if equity so permitted, in favor of the injured parties.

The trial court had excused the plaintiffs for their unwarranted delay in beginning their action for rescission under findings to the effect that they were and continued to be under the influence of defendants unduly and improperly exercised upon them. It was shown in the opinion of the Court of Appeals that these findings could not afford relief to plaintiffs for their laches because there was no pleading of such undue influence or of a confidential relationship, and there was no evidence upon which this relationship could be founded—nothing further, in short, than that the plaintiffs believed the representations of the defendants. But upon petition to this court it was pointed out that in the month of October, 1910, after discovery of the frauds and the worthless character of the contract into which plaintiffs had been induced to enter, Mrs. Brown sought an interview with defendant Crooker and said to him:

"There is nothing about this deal like we expected it to be," and I says, 'Let's give back the papers and quit,' and he says, 'No, we are not in the business to give anything back.'"

No mention of this evidence had been made in the opinion of the Court of Appeals. This court, for the reasons above indicated, thought it worth while to consider the question with a view to determining whether this evidence could be construed, under all of the circumstances, as a sufficient offer of rescission and a refusal by defendants to rescind, and whether, if this position could be sustained, it could properly be said that the subsequent delay in commencing the action to rescind was not unconscionable.

But an examination of the record at once presents an insurmountable difficulty to the following out of this line of thought and reasoning; for it appears that after this interview and refusal by defendant's president to entertain any proposition for rescission a new composition agreement in writing was entered into between the parties, dated the 11th day of January, 1911. It need not be set forth at length. It is sufficient to say that in its legal effect it recognizes the validity and existence of the first contract, and provides for certain modifications of its terms.

[1] As a necessary consequence there is presented the situation of the parties plaintiff becoming aware of the frauds which had been perpetrated upon them, of having suggested, if not having demanded, a rescission, which was met by refusal, and thereafter having entered into a new and modified agreement covering the subject-matter of the first contract. Under familiar principles, this new agreement thus entered into, with knowledge of the impositions practiced upon them, constituted a waiver of the fraud.

[2] The only facts which would relieve these plaintiffs from the legal effect of this waiver would be pleadings and proof showing either that they were induced to enter into the second composition agreement by undue influence, fraud, or mistake, or that the terms of the second composition agreement were not lived up to by the defendants, wherefore it might be said that their earlier right to sue in an action based upon the original fraud was restored or revived. No such pleading as this, however, is presented, and, as has been said, the court's finding of undue influence, which might possibly accomplish the same result in favor of plaintiffs, is supported neither by pleading nor evidence.

[3-5] It follows therefore that the District Court of Appeal was correct in its reasoning and conclusion. Its opinion, which follows, is adopted, and the judgment and order appealed from are reversed:

"Respondents herein, on the 12th day of July, 1910, entered into a contract with the appellants whereby the purchase of a certain lot of washing machines was agreed to be made. As part consideration moving from the respondents, equities in certain real estate of the agreed value of $3,500 were conveyed to appellants. Conditions were made by the contract whereby possession of the washers was not to be delivered except upon certain payments being made by respondents. The venture proved unprofitable to respondents, who in January, 1912, tendered the contracts back to appellants and demanded that a reconveyance of the equities in the real property be made to them. Judgment was in favor of the plaintiffs. This appeal was then taken from that judgment and from an order denying the motion of defendants for a new trial.

"The complaint is long and multifarious in its statement of alleged false representations which induced the plaintiffs to enter into the contract with defendants, and but few of these present matters which are sufficient to support an action for rescission. The most of them consist of a narrative of alleged promises and representations as to future conditions which the plaintiffs claimed were made to them and by reason of which they were induced to enter into the contract. But there may be gleaned from the complaint statements of a few representations, the matters embraced in which, if untrue, as found by the trial judge, are sufficient to support the judgment. We find, however, one insurmountable obstacle to a judgment here of affirmance of the decision of the trial court. The defense, as set up in the answer, that plaintiffs did not move promptly upon discovery of the facts constituting the alleged fraud to rescind their contract, is fully sustained by the record. From the record it appears by the testimony of the plaintiff C. S. Brown that he discovered the facts constituting the alleged fraud in January, 1911. This action was not brought until March, 1912, and the plaintiffs affirmatively allege that they attempted to rescind the contract by tendering back to the defendants on the 8th day of January, 1912, the documents received from them, and then and there made their demand for a reconveyance of the equities in the real property. From these allegations and the evidence given at the trial it appears that there was an inexcusable delay of 12 months after discovery of the alleged fraud before attempt was made to rescind, which occurred prior to the bringing of this action. The trial judge realized that the delay was inexcusable, unless justified by facts showing the case to be within some of the exceptions mentioned in section 1691 of the Civil Code, and made his finding to the effect that the reason why the rescission was not attempted sooner was because the plaintiffs were affected by the undue influence of defendants. There are no facts shown which will justify this finding in excuse of the delay. The plaintiffs were adult persons, familiar, as we must assume, with the English language, and able to understand ordinary business transactions. There was no relation of confidence induced or existing between the plaintiffs and defendants, and nothing at all from which the finding of undue influence could reasonably be made. That the failure of the plaintiffs to act promptly upon discovery of the fraud is fatal to an action to enforce rescission is fully established by the cases. Burke v. Levy, 70 Cal. 250, 11 Pac. 643; Hammond v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 522, 24 Pac. 837, 20 Am. St. Rep. 239; Marten v. Burns Wine Co., 99 Cal. 355, 33 Pac. 1107. Notwithstanding the fact that the trial judge by his findings determined that the contract received by respondents was of no value, respondents were not thereby excused from making their demand seasonably which would give notice to appellants that they had decided to rescind. In the case of McGue v. Rommel, 148 Cal. 547, 83 Pac. 1000, it is said: 'While it is true that, where a rescission in pais under section 1691 is relied on, the party rescinding need not show that he has restored that which is worthless, yet he must always show that he has complied with the requirement to "rescind promptly," and this implies some notice to the other party of such determination to extinguish the contract'—citing cases.

"The judgment and order are reversed.

In an action by a landowner praying that a water company be directed to supply him with water sufficient for 160 acres of land, to use at will on any part of his 200 acres, without designation of a specific tract, the cause of action stated in the original complaint was the same as that stated in the second and amended complaint, though the one alleged the 40 acres of plaintiff's 200, upon which the water was not allowed to be used, as the N. W. ¼ of the N.

E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 14, while the other alleged it as the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 14, a statement of the particular place upon which defendant refused to allow water to be used not being essential to the cause of action.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 837(4)—REVIEW — SCOPE—RULING ON DEMURRER.

In reviewing a judgment on demurrer to the complaint, the Supreme Court cannot anticipate that plaintiff has stated a cause of action which he cannot prove, or base an opinion on statements of counsel made only in the briefs, the court being confined to the allegations of the complaint.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by C. P. Stone, as administrator of the estate of N. Alexandrian, deceased, against the Imperial Water Company No. 1. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

George H. P. Shaw, of Los Angeles, and H. N. Dyke, of Imperial, for appellant. F. P. Willard, of Heber, R. D. McPherrin, of Imperial, and Hunsaker & Britt, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The court below sustained a demurrer to the plaintiff's second amended complaint and thereupon gave judgment for the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The action was begun by the filing of the original complaint on April 21, 1909. Thereafter, by leave of court, the plaintiff on April 11, 1913, filed the said second amended complaint. The court below sustained the demurrer to the second amended complaint on the ground that the causes of action alleged in the original complaint and in the said second amended complaint were each causes of action for trespass on real property; that the real property described as having been injured by the trespass in the original complaint and the amendments thereto was a different tract of land from that on which the injury was alleged to have occurred in the second amended complaint, and that the latter pleading set forth a new cause of action which accrued more than three years before the date of the filing thereof, and was therefore barred by the statute of limitations. Section 338, Code Civ. Proc. It bases its ruling on the decision in the case of Atkinson v. Amador, etc., Co., 53 Cal. 102.

We think the court below mistook the nature of the respective pleadings, and that the cause of action stated in the second amended complaint was substantially identical with that set forth in the original complaint. The original complaint alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of 200 acres of land described as the south half of the northwest quarter of section 13, the west half of the northeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 14, all in township 15 south, range 14 east; that the defendant was a mutual water corporation organized to supply and distribute water to its stockholders for use upon lands owned by them respectively; that, for that purpose, it had constructed a system of water-works and was distributing water therein to its stockholders and had sufficient water in its control for that purpose; that the plaintiff was the owner of a certificate of stock issued by said defendant for 160 shares of its capital stock which recited on its face that the owner thereof was entitled to the flow and use of 640 acre feet of water per annum to be used upon the above-described land, and that the plaintiff thereby was entitled to demand and receive said quantity of water for use upon said land; that on February 12, 1909, the defendant refused, and has ever since refused, to deliver such water to the plaintiff, except upon condition that the plaintiff would specify the particular 160 acres of said land to which he would thereafter confine the use of said water, or would buy 40 more shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation; that, under the provisions of the contract between the plaintiff and defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to receive from the defendant enough water at one time for the irrigation of 160 acres of land, and that he was entitled to use said water upon any portion of said land owned by him, provided that he did not irrigate more than 160 acres at any one run; that the defendant asserts and claims that it was under no obligation to deliver any water to any portion of said land until the plaintiff designated the particular 160 acres thereof to which he would confine the use of the water so delivered. The original complaint also alleges that the defendant, upon the demand made on February 12, 1909, did deliver water for use on all of said land described except 40 acres thereof, described as the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 14. The second amended complaint contained the same allegations as the original complaint, except that it alleged that the 40 acres upon which the water was not allowed to be used, in pursuance of the demand of February 12, 1909, was the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section 14, instead of the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 14, as alleged in the original complaint.

The court below concluded that the respective complaints stated a simple cause of action for the recovery of damages caused by the failure to deliver water to the particular 40-acre tract described therein as having been deprived of the water, and upon that theory it concluded that the cause of action last pleaded was an entirely different cause of action from that first pleaded. It is clear from the allegations above stated that the controversy between the parties is not over the right to irrigate a particular 40-acre tract of land, but arises from the claim on the part of the plaintiff that he is entitled to use the water upon any part of the 200 acres which he owns, as he may choose, and the conflicting claim on the part of the defendant that he must first choose or locate his right upon a specific tract of 160 acres and that he cannot receive water if he insists upon using it elsewhere, or generally upon the entire 200 acres.

[1, 2] The complaint prays that the defendant be directed to supply plaintiff with water so long as he does not, during any one irrigation or run, apply the water to more than 160 acres, for damages in a stated sum, and for such further relief as may be meet and agreeable to equity. There are also allegations showing that the plaintiff has been damaged by the deprivation of water on the tract from which it was withheld. It is apparent that the claim for damages is merely incidental to the main purpose of the action, which is to obtain a decree establishing the rights of the parties with respect to the water in controversy. The plaintiff claimed the right to have the water delivered at large over the entire tract, while the defendant claimed that the plaintiff must select a particular portion containing 160 acres and confine the delivery and use to that portion. Section 324 of the Civil Code provides that mutual water corporations, such as the defendant appears to be, may provide that its water shall be sold only to the owners of its stock—

"and that such stock shall be appurtenant to certain lands when the same are described in the certificate issued therefor; and when such certificate shall be so issued, and a certified copy of such by-law recorded in the office of the county recorder in the county where such lands are situated, the shares of stock so located on any land shall only be transferred with said lands, and shall pass as an appurtenance thereto."

The complaint does not allege in detail that this section has been complied with or that the stock held by the plaintiff is issued under the provisions thereof. It does allege, however, according to its legal effect, a contract showing that the plaintiff was entitled to receive water, in virtue of his ownership of the stock, for use upon the 200 acres described. The right described is a right to receive the water upon the 200 acres, to the specified quantity, without confining its use to any specific portion thereof. The right, as insisted on by the defendant, is less beneficial than that alleged to belong to the plaintiff. Such rights are real property, and the conflicting claims may be made the subject of an action under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are of the opinion that the main cause of action stated in the original complaint is the same as that stated in the second and amended complaint. A statement of the particular place upon which the defendant refused to allow water to be used was not essential to the cause of action, and the fact, that in the original complaint the 40-acre tract described as such place was different from that described in the last complaint, does not change the character of the cause of action, or make a new action begun at the time of the filing of the last complaint.

[3] From the statements of counsel in their briefs, it is possible that the plaintiff has stated a cause of action which he cannot prove; but we cannot anticipate this condition or base an opinion upon statements made only in the briefs. If the cause had been tried upon its merits and the facts were further disclosed the question might have been presented, but where a judgment is rendered upon a demurrer, the court is confined to the allegations of the complaint in the consideration of the case. There was no demurrer for uncertainty. While the complaint is general in terms, we think it is sufficient as a statement of the right of the plaintiff as stated above. The judgment is reversed.

A decree of distribution not appealed from, and which has become final, is the conclusive muniment of title under a will, and controls any language of the will inconsistent therewith.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Elise A. Drexler against the Washington Development Company. Judgment for defendant, on demurrer to complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Marcel E. Cerf, of San Francisco, for appellant. Alfred B. Weiler, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The court below sustained the demurrer to the complaint, and thereupon rendered judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

The action was for the specific performance of a contract to convey real estate. The contract was made on February 18, 1910. By its terms the plaintiff agreed to sell to the defendant the property described for the sum of $225,000. Of this $2,250 was paid at the time of the execution of the agreement. The remainder was to be paid upon the examination and approval by the defendant of the title of the plaintiff in the property. The defendant objected to the title exhibited by the plaintiff, and on that account refused to perform the contract. Thereupon the plaintiff began this action. Her right to maintain it depends upon the question whether or not she has a good title to the property, upon the facts stated in the complaint.

[1-3] In 1899, Louis P. Drexler was the owner in fee of the property. On August 17, 1899, he died, leaving surviving him the plaintiff, his wife, as his sole heir at law. His estate was duly administered, and distribution thereof made in regular course of law. The doubt concerning the title results from a peculiar provision of his will which is recited in the decree of distribution. By this clause of the will, being the eleventh paragraph thereof, Drexler gave to his wife, during her life, all the rents accruing from the property in controversy, and authorized her to collect the same. It also empowered her in case the buildings should be destroyed, by fire or otherwise, to collect the insurance, and to mortgage the property, if necessary, for a sum sufficient, with the insurance money, to replace the buildings destroyed. It further provided that on her death—

"the property heretofore mentioned shall go to and belong to her children, if she has any, but in case she should die without issue or have none living at the time of her death, then in that case she may bequeath the before mentioned lots and buildings to any person or persons, or to any charity or charitable institutions that she may think best or wish to do. But in no case shall my wife Elise A. Drexler have the right or power to sell the before mentioned real estate."

The will made no further disposition of the property or of any other estate or interest therein. After reciting the foregoing part of the will, the court, in the same paragraph of its decree, distributed the real estate referred to in said clause of the will to Elise A. Drexler—

"as her sole property and estate, subject, however, to the conditions expressed in said will, restraining her from the disposition and sale of said property as set forth and provided for in the said eleventh paragraph of said will, in this paragraph quoted and set forth."

The next paragraph, No. 22, of the decree, is as follows:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the rest, residue, and remainder of the estate of said Louis P. Drexler, deceased, real, personal, and mixed, and wheresoever situate, be, and the same is hereby, distributed to the said Elise A. Drexler as her sole and separate estate and property, free and clear of said collateral inheritance tax."

This decree of distribution was made on October 12, 1900. There was no appeal, and it has long since become final. The decree is, of course, the conclusive muniment of the plaintiff's title, and it controls any language of the will inconsistent therewith. This has been decided many times. We cite only the last decision on the subject, Estate of Schmierer, 168 Cal. 747, 145 Pac. 99.

The portion of the will purporting to give said property to the children of Elise A. Drexler at her death must, on the principle just stated, be disregarded. The decree, as above shown, distributes the property to her "as her sole property and estate," subject only to the condition that she shall not have the right or power to sell it. This cuts off the right of any children to the remainder therein after her death, and is, in effect, an adjudication that there were no children or possibility of any. The fact is practically conceded by both parties in their briefs.

Under the facts above stated, it is apparent that the plaintiff has an absolute fee-simple estate in the property, free from any condition restraining alienation. The twenty-first paragraph of the decree, which recites the will, purports to impose upon her estate in the property the condition that she shall not sell or dispose of the same. This, however, is a wholly ineffectual restriction. She was the heir of Louis P. Drexler; he made no disposition whatever of the property, except the rents and profits thereof accruing during her lifetime, and consequently the entire remainder, whatever it may be, and of whatsoever rights and powers it may consist, vested absolutely in her by descent at his death, subject only to administration. The twenty-second paragraph of the decree recognized this fact, and formally adjudged to her the rest, residue, and remainder of the estate of Drexler, real, personal, and mixed, as her sole and separate estate and property. This residue included the power of disposition which the eleventh paragraph of the will attempted to withhold from her. By this paragraph of the decree she obtained the power of disposition, which was withheld by the preceding paragraph. Taking the two together, therefore, she has the entire estate. The objections of the defendant to the sufficiency of the title were without foundation. No other objection was made, and the defendant has expressed its willingness to take—and pay for the property if the title offered is found to be good.

We are of the opinion that the plaintiff has a good title, that the defendant should be compelled to perform, and that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

The judgment is reversed.

McDOUGALD, City and County Treasurer, v. BOYD. (S. F. 6924.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 24, 1916.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING — 129—DEPOSIT—JOINT OWNERSHIP.

Under the express provision of the Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 90), § 16, bank deposits, made under an agreement by husband and wife with the bank that the money deposited was to be held on condition that it and its accumulations should be payable to the husband and wife, or either of them, during their joint lives, and should belong absolutely to the survivor, became the property of the husband and wife as joint tenants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 312-315, 326, 388; Dec. Dig. —129.]

2. TAXATION — 879(1)—INHERITANCE TAX—BANK DEPOSIT—JOINT TENANCY—SURVIVORSHIP.

In such case, the wife surviving did not take any interest in the deposits as heir of or successor to her deceased husband, but took by virtue of her estate originating at the time of the creation of the joint tenancy, so that an inheritance tax could not be sustained on the theory that the deposits formed a part of the husband's estate passing to her on his death; the inheritance law then in force (St. 1911, p. 713) not undertaking to impose a tax on the right accruing to a surviving joint tenant upon the death of his cotenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1702; Dec. Dig. —879(1).]

3. TAXATION — 893—INHERITANCE TAX LAW—CONSTRUCTION.

Tax proceedings, being in invitum, must comply strictly with all the requirements of the statute imposing them, and, in order to collect the tax, the government or agency seeking to recover must show the fulfillment of all the conditions upon which the obligation to pay depends.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. —893.]

4. TAXATION — 893 — INHERITANCE TAX — TRANSFER—FINDING AND JUDGMENT—CONSIDERATION.

Under Inheritance Tax Law (St. 1911) § 1, subd. 3, imposing a tax upon the transfer of property by assignment or gift, made without valuable and adequate consideration in contemplation of the death of the assignor or donor, or intended to take effect in enjoyment after death, the absence of the consideration is essential to the obligation to pay the tax, and the officer seeking to recover a tax thereunder has the burden of showing that there was no valuable and adequate consideration for the transfer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. —893.]

5. TAXATION — 893 — INHERITANCE TAX — TRANSFER—FINDING AND JUDGMENT—CONSIDERATION.

In such case, findings not declaring the want of such valuable and adequate consideration would not support a judgment declaring the tax due under such provision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. —893.]

6. TAXATION — 893—INHERITANCE—PLEADING—DEMURRER.

In a proceeding to collect an inheritance tax under St. 1911, p. 713, § 1, subd. 3, defendant, in order to raise the point that the petition failed to allege a want of consideration, was not required to demur thereto, as the demurrer would have been of no avail, where the petition alleged the property to belong to her deceased husband at his death, in which case she would have been liable for a tax under other provisions of the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. —893.]

7. TAXATION — 893 — INHERITANCE TAX — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—OBJECTION.

In such case, where the burden of proving consideration was on the plaintiff, the defendant was not bound to offer evidence, and, after judgment, might insist that the facts necessary to establish her liability had not been alleged or proven.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. —893.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceeding by John E. McDougald, treasurer of City and County of San Francisco, against Sara M. Boyd, as executrix of Colin M. Boyd, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals, bringing up the evidence by bill of exceptions. Reversed.

Geo. C. Sargent, of San Francisco, for appellant. Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Albert H. Elliott, Asst. Inheritance Tax Atty., of San Francisco (Gus L. Baraty, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent. Arthur H. Redington, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

SLOSS, J. This proceeding was instituted by the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco against the executrix of the will of Colin M. Boyd, deceased, to require the payment of an inheritance tax on the sum of $34,268.55, on deposit with the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company of San Francisco. The court entered judgment, requiring the executrix to pay a tax of $1,168.53. The defendant appeals from the judgment, bringing up the evidence by means of a bill of exceptions.

The petition alleges that the money on deposit was a part of the estate of the decedent at the time of his death. The answer denies the allegation, and alleges, in effect, that more than a year before the death of Colin M. Boyd, he and the appellant, his wife, had opened two joint accounts in said Savings Union Bank & Trust Company, and that the money so deposited was the property described in the petition. The court found that the decedent, at the time of his death, left the sum of $37,868.55 on deposit with the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company. It further found, in accordance with the allegations of the answer, that on February 27, 1911, something over a year before Boyd's death, said Boyd and his wife, the appellant had opened the joint accounts mentioned in the answer; that at the time of said deposits the sums so deposited were the individual property of Colin M. Boyd; that the deposits were made by said Boyd in contemplation of his death, and were intended by him to take effect in possession and enjoyment as to the appellant herein after the death of said Colin M. Boyd. There is no averment in the petition, nor is there any finding, that the deposits, or the transfers which they constituted, were made without valuable or adequate consideration. The findings that the money on deposit was a part of the estate of Colin M. Boyd at the time of his death, that the transfers were made in contemplation of death, and that they were intended to take effect in possession and enjoyment after the death of Colin M. Boyd are all assailed as unsupported by the evidence.

[1] We think it clear that the evidence does not support the finding that the sums of money remaining on deposit at the time of the death of Colin M. Boyd were a part of his estate. At the time the two joint accounts were opened, Boyd and his wife signed an agreement with the bank, to the effect that the money deposited was to be held on the understanding and condition that the same and all accumulations thereof should be payable to Colin M. Boyd and Sara M. Boyd, or either of them, during their joint lives, and should belong absolutely to the survivor of them. The deposits thereby became the property of the husband and wife as joint tenants. Such is the express declaration of section 16 of the Bank Act, in force at the time of the deposits and of Boyd's death. Stats. 1909, p. 90. See, also, Est. of Harris, 169 Cal. 725, 147 Pac. 967; Kennedy v. McMurray, 169 Cal. 287, 146 Pac. 647.

[2] Mrs. Boyd did not take any interest in the deposits as heir or successor to her deceased husband. She took by virtue of her estate originating at the time of creation of the joint tenancies. The imposition of the tax cannot therefore be sustained upon the theory that the deposits formed a part of the estate of Colin M. Boyd, passing upon his death to his wife. Estate of Harris, supra; Kennedy v. McMurray, supra. Boyd died on March 13, 1912. The inheritance tax statute then in force was the act approved April 7, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 713), and this act did not undertake to impose a tax on the right accruing to a surviving joint tenant upon the death of his cotenant. A provision bearing upon this matter was enacted for the first time in the act of 1913. See section 3c of

[3-5] The respondent seeks to sustain the tax upon the provisions of section 1, subd. 3, of the act of 1911, which declares that:

"A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon the transfer of any property * * * in the following cases: * * * (3) When the transfer is of property * * * by deed, grant, bargain, sale, assignment or gift, made without valuable and adequate consideration in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, assignor or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death."

The court found, as has already been stated, that the deposits in question were made in contemplation of Boyd's death, and that they were intended to take effect in possession and enjoyment after his death. We need not here review the evidence in order to determine whether either of these findings has support in the evidence. Assuming that both are fully sustained, the findings do not fill the measure of the statute for want of a further finding that the transfers (or deposits) were made "without valuable and adequate consideration." No authority need be cited to support the proposition that tax proceedings, being in invitum, must comply strictly with all the requirements of the statute imposing them. In order to collect a tax, the government or agency seeking to recover must show the fulfillment of all of the conditions upon which the obligation to pay the tax depends. The act in question does not impose a tax, generally, upon transfers made in contemplation of death, or intended to take effect in enjoyment after death. It imposes a tax only upon such transfers when made "without valuable and adequate consideration." The absence of the consideration is just as essential to the obligation to pay the tax as is the contemplation of death or the intention of the transferor that possession or enjoyment shall be postponed until death. It is plain, therefore, that the officer seeking to recover a tax under subdivision 3 of section 1 must show that there was not a valuable and adequate consideration for the transfer. For like reasons, findings which do not declare the want of such consideration will not support a judgment declaring a tax due under this subdivision. The rule that the burden is on a claimant to establish his right to an exemption from taxation has no application here. It is not a question of exemption. The statute does not assume to relieve from the payment of a tax otherwise imposed on transfers those made on a valuable and adequate consideration. It imposes the tax, in the first instance, only upon transfers made without such consideration. There may be good reason for saying that because of the difficulties of the case—the fact in issue being a negative and peculiarly within the knowledge of the adverse party (see In re Loewi's Estate, 75 Misc. Rep. 57, 134 N. Y. Supp. 679, 680)—slight proof would be required of the party seeking to show that there had been no adequate consideration for the transfer. But this does not alter the fact that the burden of proof is upon such party, and that a finding that there was not a valuable consideration is necessary to support a judgment declaring the tax due.

[6, 7] It is said by respondent that if the appellant wished to raise this point, she should have demurred to the petition for failure to allege a want of consideration. Such a demurrer would, however, have been of no avail, since the petition alleged that the property belonged to Colin M. Boyd at the time of his death. If this allegation had been true, the respondent would have been liable for the tax under provisions of the statute other than subdivision 3 of section 1. It is further urged that the case was tried upon the theory that there was no consideration. We are unable to see that the record sustains this claim. It does not appear that there was any reference to the matter of consideration during the trial, or that there was any evidence specifically directed to this point. If the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, the defendant was not bound to offer evidence, and she has a perfect right, after judgment, to insist that the facts necessary to establish a liability upon her part have not been alleged or proven.

The cause will therefore have to be remanded for a new trial. Respondent may, if so advised, apply to the court below for leave to amend his petition.

The judgment is reversed.

Fred S. Howell, of Petaluma, and W. D. L. Held, of Ukiah, for appellant. J. W. Ford and Thos. J. Geary, both of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Ann La Point, deceased, brought the action to have two certain gifts of money made by deceased in her lifetime set aside and decreed invalid, null, and void.

The complaint is an elaborate statement of facts alleged on information and belief, in which is alleged a conspiracy entered into by defendants to induce the deceased to leave her husband, and representations are alleged to have been falsely and fraudulently made by defendants to deceased with the object of disrupting her marital relations with her husband and to arouse in her a sentiment of hatred towards and dislike of her husband, and that by reason thereof deceased was induced to leave her husband; that this fraudulent conspiracy had for its object the procurement from deceased the money she possessed, and that the gifts made to defendant Martha Hart by deceased were brought about through said conspiracy; that deceased, was an old woman, feeble in mind and body and in poor health, and that her mind was perturbed and deranged thereby, "and that defendants poisoned the mind of deceased against her husband by representing that her husband would cheat her of her money"; that deceased was addicted to the use of alcoholic liquors, particularly beer, and consumed them in such quantities as seriously to affect her mind and understanding and incapacitate her for the management of her or any business; that, about March 1, 1895, defendants, by their said corrupt and fraudulent conspiracy, and while deceased was residing with her then lawful husband, enticed decedent away from her said husband and induced decedent to live with them; that, on or about March 23, 1895, and while decedent was residing with defendants, decedent "did make a purported gift of the sum of $3,761.09 to the defendant Martha Hart, without any consideration whatever from said Martha Hart or from any other person or persons"; that at said time decedent was of the age of 65 years, "and that at said time decedent was feeble in mind and body, ignorant, and in weak health, and that her mind was perturbed and deranged thereby, and she was easily susceptible of influence and prejudice," and said gift "was procured and obtained by the defendants fraudulently and corruptly combining and conspiring together"; that said gift was the result of undue influence exercised upon decedent "by defendants fraudulently and corruptly combining together," and that, at the time she made said gift, decedent "was not free from duress, menace, fraud, and undue influence, but was in fact subjected to duress, menace, fraud, and undue influence by and on the part of defendants, both corruptly and fraudulently combining and conspiring together"; that at the time she made said gift decedent was not of sound mind.

In a second and separate cause of action a gift by deceased to defendant Martha Hart of $900, on or about July 15, 1907, represented by a certificate of deposit in a Petaluma bank, is alleged. The alleged facts leading up to said gift are much the same as in the first cause of action. It is also alleged "that by reason of the foregoing facts and the domestic relation existing between decedent and defendants, a confidential and fiduciary relationship existed between deceased and defendants at all times while decedent resided with defendants aforesaid."

The court found against plaintiff in respect of all the accusatory charges alleged in the complaint affecting the conduct and motives of defendants. The following findings are all that seem necessary to be stated:

"V. That on or about the 23d day of March, 1895, while said decedent was residing with the defendants, the said decedent made a free and voluntary gift of the sum of $3,761.09 to defendant Martha Hart.

"VI. That at the time said gift was made decedent was of the age of 65 years or thereabouts. That at said time decedent was not feeble in mind or body, or ignorant, or in weak health, and her mind was not perturbed or deranged and she was not easily susceptible of influence or prejudice, and was at said time of sound and disposing mind. * * *

"VIII. That the mind of said decedent did not become biased, poisoned, or prejudiced against her said husband by reason of any representations or statements made to said decedent by the defendants or either of them. That the said decedent did not avoid meeting her said husband, and did not at any time refuse to see or talk with him. That decedent was not at any time under the control, dominion, or undue influence of the defendants, or either of them. That at no time while the said decedent resided with defendants was she ignorant, or weak in mind or body. * * *

"XI. That on or about the 15th day of July, 1907, while decedent was residing with defendants, the said deceased duly indorsed and delivered to defendant Martha Hart a good and valid certificate of deposit payable to the order of decedent, and drawn on the William Hill Bank of Petaluma, Cal., for the sum of $900. That said certificate of deposit was a gift from decedent to Martha Hart. That on the 15th day of July, 1908, defendant Martha Hart duly cashed said certificate of deposit at the Petaluma National Bank for the full sum of $900.

"XII. That at the time said certificate of deposit was indorsed and delivered to defendant Martha Hart as a gift, decedent was of the age of 77 years, or thereabouts. That at said time, or at any other time, said decedent was not feeble in mind or body, or ignorant, or in weak health, and decedent was not at any time stupefied, or her mind perturbed or deranged by the daily or other use and consumption of alcoholic liquor, commonly known as beer, and she was not at any time easily, or at all, susceptible of influence or prejudice. * * *

"XV. That at the time said gift was made, and at all other times, said decedent was of sound mind. * * *

"XVII. That decedent was not, on the 23d day of March, 1895, or at any other time, under the control, dominion, or influence of defendants, or either of them. That at said time decedent was of the age of 65 years or thereabouts. That decedent was not weak in mind or body, or ignorant in business or financial matters. That the mind of said decedent was not, at any time subsequent to the 23d day of March, 1895, nor for a long time, or any time prior thereto, benumbed or stupefied by the daily or long-continued use of alcoholic liquor, commonly known as beer, or any other intoxicating liquor. That decedent was not made incompetent thereby, or at all. That no confidential or fiduciary relationship existed at any time between decedent and defendants, or either of them. That at the time said gift was made, the acts, deeds, or conduct of decedent pertaining to her business or financial matters were not guided, influenced, or controlled by the defendants, or either of them. That no position of trust, confidence, or superiority of mind or intellect over said decedent was ever held or exercised by defendants, or either of them."

As conclusions of law the court found that both said sums were gifts freely and voluntarily made, and judgment passed accordingly. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment on bill of exceptions.

On this appeal, plaintiff, in his brief, states that:

"Actual fraud, sufficient of itself, and standing alone, to avoid the gifts in question, has, perhaps, not been shown here."

It is further stated:

"We are seeking the application of those equitable principles which forbid one standing in a superior and dominant position from benefiting by the act of him who bestows confidence and trust in the donee, which forbid one, while standing in the position of a guardian or protector, the fruits of transactions with his ward, or dependent, to his own financial gain. The confidence and trust which exist between such persons must ever remain inviolate," etc.

It is quite manifest that the grounds now urged for a reversal of the judgment depend upon the truth of the assumption that a fiduciary and confidential relation of trust and confidence existed between defendants and Mrs. La Point, and hence it was incumbent upon defendants "to show affirmatively and clearly that their transactions" with Mrs. La Point "were conducted fairly, openly, and that no undue advantage has been taken" of her. It will at once be seen that the premise from which appellant draws his conclusion is that a fiduciary relation of confidence and trust existed between the parties concerned. The court found that such relation did not exist. No natural or artificial relation existed from which that of confidence and trust might arise by implication or presumption, such as cestui que trust and trustee, parent and child, husband and wife, guardian and ward. These persons, the La Points and Harts, had been neighbors and friends for several years prior to 1895; Mrs. Hart visited Mrs. La Point frequently, and enjoyed the friendship and esteem of the latter to a greater extent perhaps than other of her neighbors. Mr. Hart had no business relations with La Point or his wife, and had no occasion or inducement to sustain other than the ordinary relationship existing between neighbors. There was no evidence that would have justified the court in finding the existence of what in the mind of a chancellor or in the contemplation of law or equity would be regarded as a relation of trust and confidence such as appellant seeks to attribute to these persons. Nor do we think that the subsequent conduct of the Harts and Mrs. La Point, as shown by the evidence, would have warranted the court in finding otherwise than it did—

"that no confidential or fiduciary relationship existed at any time between decedent and defendants, or either of them; * * * that no position of trust, confidence, or superiority of mind or intellect over said decedent was ever held or exercised by defendants, or either of them."

It appeared that, in February, 1895, Ann La Point and her husband were living on a small place at Lakeville, Sonoma county, which belonged to Ann as her separate property, and upon which her husband had conducted a roadhouse or saloon for a number of years. They were married in 1875. They lived together until March 1, 1895, when Mrs. La Point went to the home of the defendants and took up her residence with them, and so remained until about March 19, 1912, when she died intestate, having lived with defendants 17 years. There was testimony as to the cause of her having left her husband, which, among other grounds, tended to show that he had diverted his affection from his wife and bestowed it upon another woman. Mrs. Hart testified:

"She came to me in her trouble and told me she was afraid of her life and she says, 'Fred (her husband) has driven me out of my home.' And for that reason she says, 'I have no roof over my head,' and I says, 'You have one now,' and she says, 'Yes,' and I says, 'Well, stay under it,' and that is all I had to say. She came there crying; an old lady 65 years old."

La Point testified:

"I did not sleep in the old house occupied by my wife during the last year before she left, and not more than two or three times during the last 2 years. I spent most of my spare time in my brother's house, listening to my sister-in-law (his alleged affinity) reading. I lived at Lakeville about two or three weeks and at Petaluma for 1 year after my wife left me, and I made no effort to get into communication with her. My sister-in-law and I went out on several trips together, we went hop picking once for about three weeks. That was not the cause of the trouble between my wife and I. I went to British Columbia with my sister-in-law and my brother, and was gone about 2½ years. I did not write to my wife while I was gone, nor to any one else at Lakeville to inquire about my wife. I felt that if she was satisfied to call it quits I was. * * * From the time I returned from British Columbia in 1899 down to the time of my wife's death about a year ago I never saw her to speak to her. I made no effort to see her. I was perfectly satisfied to let her live as she was living if she would let me alone. I made no effort to ascertain if she was being cared for or not. I do not know how the Harts were treating her. I did not go to my wife's funeral because I did not feel like it. She was buried at Petaluma, and I was living at Petaluma at the time."

He testified that he had a policy for $2,000 payable to his wife, but, in 1894, he had it made payable to his sister and nephew.

"I had the policy changed because I knew my wife had plenty, and she wouldn't give me any of her money, and I didn't intend she should have any of mine. My wife was pretty stubborn; when she made up her mind I could not change it."

It was shown that, on March 23, 1895, Mrs. La Point caused her credit account of $3,761.09 in an Oakland savings bank to be transferred to Mrs. Hart, and on July 15, 1907, she assigned to Mrs. Hart a certificate of deposit calling for $900 in a Petaluma bank, which Mrs. Hart cashed. There was testimony as to the drinking habit of deceased prior to leaving her husband, the purpose being to support the charge that her excessive use of intoxicants weakened her mind and body and rendered her incompetent. The testimony was conflicting on this point, but we think the testimony justified the finding of the court already noted. This testimony related to a period before she left her husband; and, while it may have had a bearing upon her condition when the first gift was made, there was no evidence that she was addicted to the use of intoxicants to excess, or at all for that matter, after she went to live with the Harts, and hence had no bearing upon her condition in 1907, 12 years later, unless the alleged effect of her early alleged intemperance continued, and this is not shown. Testimony as to the mental condition generally of Mrs. La Point was introduced, and some witnesses testified that she was "simple," and that her conversation was "childish" or "childlike." Several witnesses who had known her for many years intimately, both before and after she went to the Harts' home, testified that she was perfectly sound in mind. The court so found on sufficient evidence. There was testimony also that while living with the Harts she appeared "to be happy and contented," and that her affection for the Harts and theirs for her was mutual.

There was but little testimony as to the circumstances immediately attending these gifts, and what there was came from Mrs. Hart, whose testimony was taken at the instance of plaintiff in the matter of the estate of Ann La Point, deceased, and was used at the trial. Speaking of the first gift, she testified that when Mrs. La Point made the transfer she asked Mrs. Hart to go with her to Oakland, and told her she wanted to give her her money.

"She said, 'I want to give you my money, Mattie,' she says, 'I want you to go with me; I want to give you my money.' Q. Did she say anything else? A. No; she wanted to give me her money. * * * Q. What did she ever say about that money that she left? A. Five years ago she told me, she said: 'Mattie, I want you to have my money; I don't want Fred or his people to have $1 that I have; I want you to have it.' Q. Did you ever have any discussion with the deceased, Mrs. La Point, in regard to board and keeping? A. No. Q. You did not expect to keep her for nothing until she died, did you, Mrs. Hart? A. I never thought of anything like that; she came to me in her trouble and told me she was afraid of her life and she says, 'Fred has driven me out of my home.'"

It appeared that Mrs. La Point sold the place where she and her husband had formerly lived and, some time later, July 15, 1907, she assigned the certificate of deposit to Mrs. Hart. This was all the property she had left after her gift of the deposit in the Oakland bank.

The property brought $900. Mrs. Hart testified as to this $900:

"Q. Wasn't it understood that that money was to be used for her expenses and board? A. No; she never said one thing as to what I was to do with her money. It was used for her funeral expenses and fixing up the cemetery, that money she gave me."

She testified:

"Q. Did she ever consult you and act on your advice in any matter? A. Any matters? Q. Her business matters. A. Her troubles? Q. No, in her family affairs; her business matters. A. No; not her business matters. She didn't have any business matters; only she wanted to give me her money; that's the only business matters. * * * Q. Didn't she say she wanted you to have this money when she died? A. She never said 'died'; she said she wanted me to have the money. * * * Q. Had she been turned out of your house she would have been penniless? A. No; she would not; she would not have been turned out of our house in the first place. Q. I am assuming that she would. A. Well, she would never have been turned out; if anything would have happened to me, my husband would have looked out for her; and if anything would have happened to him, my children would have looked out for her. My children looked to her just the same as if she were a relative; she came to us when they were tiny. * * * Q. As far as you ever noticed or observed, she was perfectly capable of handling her own affairs and did not require any one's advice, is that a fact? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. And her mind was perfectly bright and clear? A. Oh, yes; bright and clear until the day she died. * * * Q. How long have you known Mrs. La Point, how many years? A. Let's see; oh I guess 33 or 34 years. Q. And you have been friendly all that time? A. Oh, yes; the best of friends. The Court: She was no relation to you? A. No; just old friends."

It does not seem necessary to pursue the evidence further. Appellant failed to establish any sort of trust or fiduciary relation between the parties; or that the gift was secured by undue influence exercised over the donor; or that she was mentally or physically incompetent or in any degree incapable of managing her own affairs or comprehending the nature of the transaction by which she parted with all her property; or that she needed independent advice. She lived in apparent happiness and contentment with defendants for 17 years, and was cared for as one of the family. If, as is claimed, "in stripping herself of every dollar she had without any consideration," she did an improvident and unusual act, this alone carries no implication of fraud, undue influence, or incompetence. She had a right to do what she pleased with her own. She probably, on the score of long friendship, believed that she would find a home with defendants as long as she might live, and was willing to give her money to Mrs. Hart in this belief, and the facts show that if such was her motive she was not disappointed. But, whatever her motive, we find no facts or circumstances surrounding the transaction which impeach the validity of the gift.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PASQUERIA. (Cr. 484.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California, June 2, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 31, 1916.)

1. ROBBERY — 24(1) — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held sufficient to justify conviction of robbery, where all elements of the offense as defined by Pen. Code, § 211, were present.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Robbery, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. — 24(1).]

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 1160 — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

If evidence against defendant, considered by itself without regard to conflicting evidence, is sufficient to support the verdict, the question ceases to be one of law, and becomes one of fact, upon which the decision of the jury and the trial court is final and conclusive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3084; Dec. Dig. — 1160.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 1166½(1) — CONDUCT OF TRIAL — QUESTION BY COURT — PREJUDICE.

Where the court, to clear up his understanding of testimony, recalled the prosecuting witness and questioned him as to defendant's acts during the alleged robbery, such questions were not prejudicial, where they elicited only reiteration and were in the nature of cross-examination which might have been favorable to accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3119-3122; Dec. Dig. — 1166½(1).]

4. CRIMINAL LAW — 543(2) — EVIDENCE — DEPOSITIONS — ADMISSIBILITY.

On a showing that the deponent had left the state and would not return, evidence in his deposition, given at preliminary examination, so far as competent, was admissible under Pen. Code, § 869.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1233, 1236; Dec. Dig. — 543(2).]

5. CRIMINAL LAW — 783½ — TRIAL — EVIDENCE — MOTION TO STRIKE.

Where, under objection to evidence of statements of prosecuting witness in a deposition and motion to strike it as incompetent, without pointing out particular testimony, the court struck out statements of a third person not made in defendant's hearing, its refusal to instruct the jury to "disregard any statement" was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1879, 1986; Dec. Dig. — 783½.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW — 1134(6) — EVIDENCE — DEPOSITIONS — OBJECTIONS.

Pen. Code, § 869, provides that deposition of one taken at preliminary hearing may be read at the trial where deponent is out of the state, subject to objections as if he were present under section 1345, though no objection was taken before the magistrate. Held, that objection that evidence of a statement made by deponent within a few feet of defendant was incompetent because not made in his presence was properly overruled, though the court based its ruling on the ground that no objection had been made at the preliminary hearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2991; Dec. Dig. ☞1134(6).]

7. CRIMINAL LAW ☞366(4)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

It is not error to refuse motion to strike testimony of officer to whom prosecuting witness complained of the robbery that such witness was excited and kept saying that accused was the one who robbed him.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Alonzo Pasqueria was convicted of robbery, and from the judgment and order denying motion for new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert N. Ellis and C. B. Ellis, both of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery. He appeals from the judgment and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. The testimony of Tom Jing, the prosecuting witness, is to the effect that defendant, shortly before 6 o'clock p. m., November 2, 1915, entered his place of business, claiming to be a detective, in proof of which he exhibited what purported to be an official star, and, accusing Jing of having lottery tickets in his possession, stated that he wanted to search his place. Thereupon defendant, under the pretense of making a search for lottery tickets, put his hand in Jing's pockets and took therefrom a pocket-book and purse, from which he abstracted $30 in money, a diamond ring valued at $65, and a stickpin worth $15, and, putting them in his own pocket, struck Jing upon his jaw and ran out of the store, followed by the prosecuting witness, who later pointed out defendant to a police officer who arrested him. At the trial Jing positively identified defendant as the man who, in the manner stated, had taken his property. This and other evidence, with circumstances established, if believed by the jury, was sufficient, not only to justify it in the conclusion that defendant took the property, but that such taking was accompanied by all the elements constituting the crime charged. Section 211, Pen. Code. Hence, it was not error, as claimed by appellant, for the court to instruct the jury as to what constituted robbery.

[2] Counsel for appellant at great length reviews the evidence and devotes much of his brief to a discussion of the weight which should be accorded the conflicting testimony of witnesses called at the trial, and asserts with much show of sincerity that the testimony of—"a former member of the Chicago police department is far more likely to be accurate than that of the excited Chinese complaining witness."

With reference to this observation and the lengthy discussion of the subject indulged in by counsel, we can only repeat what has so often been said by the appellate courts of this state, namely:

"If the evidence which bears against the defendant, considered by itself, and without regard to conflicting evidence, is sufficient to support the verdict, the question ceases to be one of law—of which alone this court has jurisdiction—and becomes one of fact upon which the decision of the jury and the trial court is final and conclusive." People v. Emerson, 130 Cal. 562, 62 Pac. 1069.

[3] It is claimed that the substantial rights of defendant were prejudiced by the action of the court in recalling the prosecuting witness after the close of the people's case and interrogating him as follows:

"The Court: There is one point I wish to ask him on that is not clear in my mind. You have stated you had your money in your right-hand trouser pocket? A. Yes, sir.

"The Court: Who took the money out of that pocket? A. The defendant here."

The witness had theretofore testified as follows:

"Q. Where did you have the money? A. On my pocket here. Q. Which pocket? A. The front pocket. Q. Which side, left or right? A. On this side; and then after that he put his hand on this pocket and took my pocketbook out, and after that he put his hand on this pocket and took my purse out, and he couldn't open that purse—it is a spring purse—and I opened and showed him."

And when asked how much was taken out of "your righthand pocket" he replied:

"I later remember I got $30 there, because I got $30 to pay my rent."

There was nothing in the question of the court calculated to impress the jury that he thought defendant was guilty. As stated, the interrogation was for the purpose of clearing the mind of the court upon the subject of the inquiry. The answer was but a reiteration of what the witness had already testified to. The facts presented furnish no ground for the claim that the court was guilty of misconduct to the prejudice of defendant. On the contrary, since Jing had theretofore testified that defendant took the money out of his pocket, the question was in the nature of cross-examination, in reply to which Jing might have modified his former answer, making it more favorable to defendant.

[4] Defendant's objection to the admission in evidence of the deposition of one Kingsley, given at the preliminary examination, was overruled. It appears that Kingsley had left the state and would not return. Upon such showing, the evidence contained in the deposition, so far as competent, was clearly admissible at the trial of defendant. Pen. Code, § 869; People v. Oiler, 66 Cal. 102, 4 Pac. 1066.

[5] At the close of the reading of the deposition, defendant moved the court to strike therefrom evidence relating to statements made by Jing, upon the ground that they were incompetent. Counsel did not, other than in this general way, direct the court's attention to any particular testimony. Nevertheless, the court granted the motion as made saying:

"It is difficult for the court to rule on the motion intelligently. Some of them apparently were made while the defendant was in hearing; some of them apparently were not so made. Of course, if the defendant was not in hearing or might reasonably have heard what was said, it would not be binding upon him."

Thereupon defendant's counsel said, "Will you instruct the jury to disregard any statement?" to which the court replied, "I have already told them as to evidence that is stricken out." The court having stated that defendant would not be bound by statements of Jing not made in the former's hearing, this was, under the circumstances, sufficient and, upon the motion made, all that defendant had a right to ask. Certainly there was no error in refusing to "instruct the jury to disregard any statement," as requested by counsel.

[6] During the reading of the deposition counsel for defendant interposed an objection upon the ground that the question was incompetent, to which the court replied:

"There was no objection made below. There having been no objection made or motion to strike out this evidence in the court below at the preliminary, the objection now will be overruled."

As an abstract proposition of law, the statement of the court may be conceded to have been erroneous. While as provided by section 869 of the Penal Code the deposition of one testifying at a preliminary hearing may, under the circumstances there mentioned, be used at the trial, nevertheless, when so used, it is subject to the same objections as though the witness was present and testifying. The fact that no objection was interposed by defendant when the testimony was given before the magistrate does not bar him from objecting when the deposition is read at the trial (section 1345, Pen. Code), while, it is true, the court did not err in overruling the objection, the incompetency of which was based upon the claim that it was a statement made by Jing without the presence of defendant, since, as appears from the record, he was but a few feet away and near enough to have heard the statement. People v. Osaki, 25 Cal. App. 330, 143 Pac. 789.

[7] Another alleged error is based upon the fact that the court denied defendant's motion to strike out an answer given by Officer Cooley to the question:

"What else was said there by the Chinaman in the presence of the defendant?"

To which he replied:

"The Chinaman was excited and kept talking, 'This is the man that robbed me.' I didn't pay attention to everything that he did say; he talked considerable."

There is no merit in the contention. Conceding the court admitted in evidence portions of the deposition which might be said to be immaterial and to which objections interposed were overruled, defendant's substantial rights could not have been prejudiced thereby.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

7. RAPE ⚡43(1) — TRIAL — IMPROPER CROSS-EXAMINATION — PHYSICAL EXAMINATION OF ACCUSED.

It is error in a prosecution for rape to require the defendant to answer a question on cross-examination as to whether he will submit to a physical examination by a physician to be designated by the court to determine whether he was capable of performing an act of sexual intercourse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. ⚡43(1).]

8. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡1169(5) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR.

Error in requiring that defendant in a rape case answer on cross-examination whether he would submit to a physical examination to determine his impotency held not prejudicial, where the court instructed the jury that his refusal to be examined must not be considered as giving rise to any inference against him whatever.

9. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡1147 — RAPE — SENTENCE — REVIEW.

The sentence of 25 years imposed for rape, while equivalent to a life sentence in view of defendant's age, is a matter resting entirely in the conscience and discretion of the trial judge, and will not be disturbed on appeal however much the appellate court may doubt its propriety.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

W. R. Deatruck was convicted of rape, and he appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Velch & Richardson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, and sentenced by the trial court to serve a term of 25 years' imprisonment at San Quentin. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The act which was denounced by the information as making out the crime charged was alleged to have been accomplished with one Amy Deatruck, the adopted daughter of the defendant. It is alleged in the information that the child was of the age of 14 years. It appears that the girl was brought into the family of the defendant by adoption when she was about the age of 5 years. The family lived at various places during the years succeeding the adoption of the child, and finally took up their residence at Belleflower, in Los Angeles county, where the defendant engaged in the business of raising poultry. The house in which they lived was a small building divided into three rooms. The household then consisted of defendant, the adopted child and the defendant's wife. The child was sent to school and was also provided with musical instruction by the defendant. The defendant hired a young man named Fay Detrick, who was not related to him in any way, although bearing a similar name. This young man occupied one of the rooms in the little house. In another of the rooms were two beds, in one of which defendant's wife and the little girl habitually slept, and the other, which was a single bed, the defendant used. After Fay Detrick had been in the house for about a month or a little over, a dispute arose between the husband and wife which finally resulted in the wife leaving and going to the city of Los Angeles. The adopted daughter accompanied her, and neither of them afterwards returned to the defendant's place. It was some time before the defendant learned the whereabouts of his wife and the girl, and before he had been able to see them he was arrested on the charge made by the information in this case. The theory upon which counsel for the defense presented their case was that this defendant was wholly innocent of the crime charged, and that his prosecution was brought about by his wife and the girl through a spirit of revenge and for the purpose of protecting Fay Detrick, with whom both Mrs. Deatruck and the girl Amy had sustained illicit relations. It was sufficiently shown by the admissions of Fay Detrick on the witness stand that he had had sexual intercourse with Amy Deatruck while he was working for the defendant at the Belleflower place. It was also shown that after Mrs. Deatruck and the girl came to the city of Los Angeles Fay Detrick had visited them at their apartments, and had upon three occasions stayed at the apartments all night. However, the young girl gave testimony at the trial, and directly charged that the defendant, not only on the day fixed in the information, but on a number of prior occasions, had sustained intimate relations with her. She said that she objected to these relations, but that they were insisted upon by the defendant. She did not deny having occupied the same bed with Fay Detrick while the latter was working for the defendant, but she claimed that this was with the permission and at the suggestion of the defendant himself. Mrs. Deatruck, who, after she left her husband, set up the claim that she had never been married to him, was not called as a witness and did not testify in the case. It was shown, in order to illustrate the erotic tendency of the defendant's mind, that he had made an improper proposal on one occasion to a young school friend of his daughter, while she was visiting at his house. It was further shown by the father of Fay Detrick that after the wife and girl had left defendant's house, defendant went to the home of Fay Detrick's parents and a conversation was there had in the presence of Fay Detrick. The witness in detailing the conversation made the following statement:

"Well," Fay says, "that Mr. Bush was to tell you where you could find your wife." "Well," he says (meaning defendant), "I seen Mr. Bush, and he won't tell me." "Well," Fay says, "if he won't tell you I won't tell you." And he said—now says Fay, he says, "If you will tell me where my wife is and the little girl is," he says, "I will let bygones be bygones." He says, "There will never be anything said about this nor nothing doing," and he says, "If you do not tell me there will be something done to-morrow." "Well," says Fay, "I will take my medicine." Mr. Deatruck says, "I will take mine," and he says he knew Fay. He says, "You know that I had three witnesses outside watch you that night." He says, "I had three witnesses watching you that night, and I know just what you done," and Fay says, "I have never done anything worse than you have done." He says, "Amy has told me all about it." So I think that that was just about all that he said to Fay then, only determined to know where he could find his wife; he was going to know that night."

A physician who made a physical examination of the young girl after the charge had been preferred against the defendant testified that he found her in much the condition of a married woman in his examination of her private organs. This, in brief, was the substance of the testimony introduced on behalf of the prosecution. It was shown in defense that the defendant was a man 56 years of age. Two physicians who had made an examination of him testified that his private organs were in such a state as to indicate to them that the defendant was impotent and had no ability to perform an act of sexual intercourse. The defendant testified that he was unable to commit the crime charged, and testified that he did not have the intercourse with the girl as alleged; that he had discovered relations of intimacy between Fay Detrick and his wife, and also between Fay Detrick and Amy Deatruck; that upon making this discovery he upbraided his wife and made a partial threat to have Fay Detrick arrested; that the wife declared to him that if he did cause the arrest of Fay Detrick the three of them, to wit, Mrs. Deatruck, Fay Detrick, and Amy Deatruck, would shift the charge to the defendant in order to save Fay Detrick from prosecution. There was testimony given by a number of witnesses, evidently reputable citizens of the neighborhood of Belleflower, to the effect that the defendant's reputation for the trait involved in this charge, and also for honesty and integrity, was good. Under this state of the evidence the case went to the jury, and the verdict of guilty was returned.

[1] This court on appeal cannot say that the evidence was insufficient to justify the conviction; for there was ample evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury. A number of errors are assigned, many of which go to the matter of the introduction of testimony and the refusal of the court to allow certain matters to be shown on the part of the defendant.

It is first claimed that the restriction imposed upon counsel for the defendant in their cross-examination of the girl Amy Deatruck was too close, as to questions asked her designed to extract admissions that there was a conspiracy on the part of Mrs. Deatruck, Fay Detrick, and the witness to send defendant to the penitentiary. While it is true that several of the questions to which objections were sustained were relevant and proper as tending to elicit information as to the bias of the witness, we find in the record that the same matters were in their full substance covered by other questions which were asked and to which latter questions answers were permitted to be made. We agree altogether with counsel for defendant that in a case of this kind very wide latitude should be allowed the cross-examiner.

[2] In a case where the charge is as that made in the information here, and the prosecutrix is a young girl, the sympathies and prejudices of the jury are very easily aroused in her favor, and, as it has been very properly said, the accusation is one which is easily made and hard to disprove. However, while it is the duty of the trial court in such cases to exercise its discretion in the direction of permitting a very liberal, complete, and comprehensive cross-examination to be made of the prosecutrix, the mere fact that that discretion is not resolved as fully as it might have been in the defendant's favor does not justify a reversal of the judgment.

[3] It is secondly objected that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence certain letters and cards which passed through the mails between Fay Detrick and the prosecutrix. These missives were of an intimate and confidential tenor, but we cannot see how their rejection could have worked any prejudice to the defendant's case, inasmuch as it was abundantly shown and without any dispute whatsoever that the girl had sustained illicit relations with Fay Detrick. The contents of the letters certainly could not have argued to establish a more intimate relation than this.

[4] Defendant had introduced the testimony of two physicians tending to show that he was deficient in sexual power. He testified on his own behalf, and stated that at the time charged in the information he was unable to accomplish an act of intercourse with any person. The prosecuting attorney in cross-examining him asked as to whether subsequent to the filing of the information, while staying at the house of a friend, he had not gone to the door of a woman's bedroom in the morning and asked permission to come into the room, saying: "I just want to see if I can raise my passions." The admission of this testimony furnishes ground for vigorous objection made on behalf of appellant. It is claimed that the prosecuting attorney went outside the limits of a proper line of cross-examination. We do not think that the cross-examination was improper. The question was designed to show a contradiction of the assertion of the defendant that he was unable to accomplish sexual acts; to show that he had sought an opportunity to at least attempt such an act at a time subsequent to that charged in the information. The gist of the defendant's declarations on the witness stand was that he was altogether without inclination in the direction mentioned, and the cross-examination was directly in point as being intended to show acts inconsistent with the defendant's declaration. There was no attempt to impeach the witness upon his answering in the negative.

[5, 6] It is contended that the evidence conclusively showed that the defendant was impotent and utterly incapable of performing the act with which he was charged. That question was one for the jury, not for an appellate court, to resolve. There was direct and positive testimony that the defendant did, in fact, commit the crime charged. The testimony of the physicians did not wholly negative the possibility of the defendant being able to accomplish an act of the kind described in the testimony; the jury was not bound either by the opinion of the physicians or the statement of the defendant himself as against the testimony of the prosecutrix and all of the circumstances shown in proof. At one point in the cross-examination of the defendant the prosecuting attorney asked him as to whether he would be willing to submit himself for examination to a physician whom the court might select. He answered, in substance, that he had been examined enough, and did not care to submit himself for the inspection of any more physicians.

[7, 8] We have no doubt but that the asking of this question of the defendant on cross-examination and compelling an answer thereto was error, but we are not prepared to conclude that the damage done was such as to produce in this case a miscarriage of justice. The trial judge was evidently doubtful of the propriety of permitting the question to be answered, for he said at the time:

"I will state to the jury that, as a matter of law, no defendant is required to testify against himself in any manner, and the submitting of one's self to an examination of this character would be giving testimony against himself, so that in case he should decline to be examined you must not in any regard consider that as testimony against him or draw any inference of any character against the defendant if he should so decline."

In view of this direction to the jury, and in view of all of the testimony in the case tending to show that the crime was committed as charged in the information, it would not be declaring a reasonable conclusion to say that the disinclination of the defendant to submit himself to further examination by physicians as expressed in his answer to the question may have turned the scales in the jury's mind in favor of the prosecution and prompted the verdict of guilty.

[9] In the brief of counsel for appellant it is complained in a general way that certain offered instructions should have been given, certain of those given should have been refused, and modifications of others should not have been made. The argument addressed to these points is general and does not point out specifically wherein error was committed. While it is the duty of counsel to not only specifically point to the instruction the giving, refusing, or modification of which they claim to be error, but to particularize as to the reasons supporting their contention, we have nevertheless made a careful examination of the whole charge as given by the court, and think that it included and properly stated all the matters of law upon which the jury needed to be advised. We agree with counsel for appellant that the sentence imposed in this case, that of 25 years' imprisonment, to a man now 57 years old, means a life sentence. But, however much we might differ with the trial judge as to the propriety of such a judgment, that is a matter which rests alone with the conscience and discretion of the judge who heard the witnesses, and it is not a part of the functions of an appellate tribunal to enter upon any consideration of that question.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

OLSON-MAHONEY LUMBER CO. et al. v.
DUNNE INV. CO. et al. (Civ. 1478.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 1, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 29, 1916.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 164(1)—FAILURE TO PERFORM CONTRACT—PORTION OF PRICE SUBJECT TO LIEN.

Prior to 1911, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1200, as to mechanics' liens, where the contractor fails to perform, the amount of the contract price subject to liens of materialmen is not the difference between the amount paid the contractor and the actual value of work and materials already used, but between such amount paid and the value estimated as nearly as may be by the standard of the whole contract price.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 285, 287; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 164(1).]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 281(4)—LIEN OF MATERIALMEN—FAILURE TO PERFORM CONTRACT—PORTION OF PRICE SUBJECT TO LIEN—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to sustain the court's finding as to the amount of the whole contract price subject to mechanic's liens on failure of the contractor to complete the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 571; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 281(4).]

3. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 290(1)—FAILURE TO PERFORM CONTRACT—MONEY DUE CONTRACTOR—PORTION OF PRICE SUBJECT TO LIEN.

In arriving at the amount of the contract price to be subject to liens under Code Civ. Proc. § 1200, where the contractor fails to perform, such amount being the difference between the amount paid the contractor and the value of work and materials already used estimated on the basis of the whole price, it is unnecessary to make a finding as to the cost of completing the work.

4. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 132(9)—TIME FOR FILING.

Where a building contract was abandoned before completion, on July 20th, and the owner then took possession, and no notice of cessation of labor was filed, but a new contract was made on August 4th, and under it the building was finished November 16th, a notice of lien under the original contract filed December 14th was in time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 201; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 132(9).]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 197(3)—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW—VARIANCE—FINDINGS OF FACT.

Although complaint in mechanic's lien action alleged occupation by owner and cessation of work for over 30 days after abandonment by contractor, where the judge found to the contrary, as was alleged in the answer and supported by evidence not objected to as at variance with the pleadings, the court is justified in adopting the findings instead of the allegations of the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 197(3); Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1438-1441.]

6. PLEADING $\hookrightarrow$ 406(9)—DEFECTS—CURE BY TRIAL.

Although the complaint in mechanic's lien action failed to allege that on cessation of work there was a fund subject to lien, trial of such issue without objection cured the defect.

7. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 271(15)—ACTIONS—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

The requirement of Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, that the complaint in a mechanic's lien action allege that the lien contained a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract is sufficiently met by stating that the notice was filed, referring to it and incorporating it in the pleading, if the notice actually contained the necessary averments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 509; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 271(15).]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 193(4)—PRESERVATION OF OBJECTIONS—PLEADINGS.

In the absence of demurrer or of objection to introduction of lien in evidence, or denial of allegations of complaint which incorporated the lien, the question of sufficiency of a complaint under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, stating requirements thereof, should not be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1226; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 193(4); Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1363.]

9. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 134—CLAIM—SUFFICIENCY.

A claim for lien alleging materials furnished at contractor's request on agreement to pay on delivery without terms or condition of the reasonable value of $3,000, which were actually used in, on, or about the premises is sufficient.

10. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 277(6)—ACTIONS—VARIANCE—PLEADING AND EVIDENCE.

In mechanic's lien action, where the claim of lien alleged materials were furnished at contractor's request on agreement to pay on delivery without terms or conditions, of the reasonable value of $3,000, actually used in, on, or about the premises, and complaint alleged an agreement to pay reasonable value in cash on delivery, and evidence showed that the prices were both the market and reasonable value, and that there was agreement to pay such prices, there was no variance, but judgment foreclosing the lien was supported.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 553, 554; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 277(6).]

11. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 47—WHEN ENFORCEABLE—USE OF MATERIALS.

One who furnishes lumber used in erecting concrete forms without which building could not have been erected, and which were destroyed or given away after such use, being then of no value, has a lien therefor, although the rule cannot be given general application, but is controlled by the particular facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 50; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 47.]

12. PLEADING $\hookrightarrow$ 406(5)—OBJECTIONS—CURE BY ANSWER—VARIANCE—EFFECT.

Contradictory averments or statements not true in complaint in mechanic's lien action when at variance with the findings are not fatal to recovery where the answer cures the misstatements and the findings are supported by uncontradicted evidence, since the defendant was not misled or prejudiced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1344-1347; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 403(5).]

13. ACTION $\hookrightarrow$ 59—CONSOLIDATION—EFFECT.

An order of consolidation unites the causes of action so as to constitute one cause and one pleading, and allegations of one complaint will remedy defects and supply omissions in another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 690-698; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 59.]

14. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 277(5)—ACTIONS—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

Where the complaint in a mechanic's lien action stated facts raising an implied contract to pay for materials furnished, mere reference to a contract did not present a variance, since it cannot be assumed that any contract save that implied at law was meant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 552; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 277(5).]

15. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 291(5)—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a claim of mechanic's lien for cement furnished stated the contract price and number of barrels furnished, the claimant could not have a lien for an amount for freight and storage charges not mentioned therein, but was limited to the contract stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 603; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 291(5).]

16. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 161(3)—AMOUNT—CONTRACT PRICE.

Where claimant under a lump sum contract had actually furnished work and materials of a specified value and based his lien on the same figures as used in figuring the original contract, he was entitled to claim the full value of materials furnished, regardless of cost of completion under a new contract.

17. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1170(1)—REVERSAL

Where no prejudice resulted, since but one judgment could have been rendered under the evidence, judgment will not be reversed, as Code Civ. Proc. § 475, prohibits reversal for technical or nonprejudicial error.

18. MECHANICS' LIENS ⚡142—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

Claim of mechanic's lien cannot be defeated on the ground that it fails to state the terms and conditions of the contract, where the agreement was merely to furnish and haul sand, and there was only an implied contract to pay therefor at the prevailing rates on delivery.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Separate complaints by the Olson-Mahoney Lumber Company and thirteen others against the Dunne Investment Company and others, consolidated and tried as one. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal as to eleven plaintiffs. Judgment as to Santa Cruz Portland Cement Company modified and affirmed, and judgment otherwise affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge and Bartlett & Langdon, all of San Francisco, for appellants. J. R. Pringle, R. R. Moody, D. Hadsell, Frank A. Duryea, Wright & Wright, A. W. Liechti, Corbet & Selby, Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, Olin L. Berry, Neal Power, Geo. F. Hutton, and Hartley F. Peart, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Fourteen separate complaints were filed to enforce mechanics' and materialmen's liens, and by order of the court were consolidated and tried in one action. The plaintiffs in eleven of these several complaints are respondents, and the appeal is here under the above title. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiffs, and from this judgment defendants appeal.

Defendants Condon and McGlynn were the contractors for the work. Certain named persons defendants were owners of the property on which the building in question was erected, and defendant Dunne Investment Company was the owner of a lease executed by said owners, and erected said building in compliance with the terms of said lease. The building is situated on the northwest corner of Stockton and Ellis streets, San Francisco.

The complaints were filed in the latter part of the year 1909, and were brought to issue by answers in 1910, and on January 4, 1912, came on for trial, and findings of fact and conclusions of law were made on June 27, 1912, and judgment was entered on that day. Notice of appeal was served and filed July 27, 1912. Transcript on appeal was filed in the Supreme Court May 15, 1914. Appellants' brief was filed September 15, 1914, and respondents' brief was filed May 11, 1915. The cause was transferred to this court and papers filed here December 17, 1915, and appellants' reply brief filed here January 18, 1916. It thus appears that more than two years expired after the actions were commenced before they were brought to trial. Nearly two years elapsed thereafter before transcript was filed in the Supreme Court. A year more passed before respondents' brief was filed, and appellants' reply brief was not filed until January 18, 1916, at which time the cause was submitted. We take the liberty of calling attention to the record as typical of many cases coming by transfer to this court as showing that the delay in reaching judgments on appeals in many cases is not, as is popularly believed, the fault of the appellate courts, but of the attorneys in the cases, brought about by stipulations which the courts feel bound to respect.

The attack is first made upon the finding upon which the judgment is based, for the reason that it ignores the element of proportion to the whole contract price, that the evidence is insufficient "to sustain the finding even as to the amount, and that there is no finding of the ultimate facts, but finding No. 10 is only a conclusion of law." Appellants then assail the proceedings in each of the eleven cases on various grounds, some of which are common to all of them, while other grounds are urged to particular cases.

The contract price for the building was $52,750, and the contract, with its plans and specifications, was duly recorded before the work was commenced. Work commenced under this contract October 26, 1908, and continued until July 15, 1909. The contractors being unable to complete the building, the Dunne Investment Company gave three days' notice, as provided in the contract, to furnish the necessary labor and materials to finish the building, which the contractors being unable to do, the Dunne Investment Company employed one Charles Wright to complete the job. The contractors had received, when they abandoned the work, $31,397.50. The liens filed amounted to about $12,000.

The contract provided that:

Payments for the work should be made on the 1st of the month "as the work progresses, in installments, based upon the monthly estimates of all work done and material furnished and paid for in the building, up to and including the last day of the preceding month, in sums equal to 75 per cent. of the value of said work done and material furnished, to be estimated by the architect, provided that no more than 75 per cent. of the whole contract price shall be paid up to the time of the completion." There was the usual provision deferring payment of 25 per cent. "The monthly estimates of the architect, however, subject to correction by him in any subsequent monthly or in his final estimates. Serving merely as a basis for payments on account, they are presumed to be only approximate."

Finding 10 is as follows:

"That the value of the work and materials already done and furnished by said Condon and McGlynn on July 15, 1909, under said contract, including materials then actually delivered or on the ground, estimated by the standard of the whole contract price under said contract, was and is $41,863.33."

The court found that there was the sum of $10,465.83, subject to the various liens, being the difference between the amount of the work and materials done and furnished, namely, $41,863.33, and the amount paid to the contractors, namely, $31,397.50; that is, the payment in excess of the certificates given by the architect of 75 per cent. of the work as it progressed, as provided in the contract, was the sum of $10,465.83, and was subject to liens in accordance with the rule enforced in the case of Olson-Mahoney Lumber Co. v. Maxwell, 18 Cal. App. 668, 124 Pac. 100.

[1-3] It is well settled that prior to the revisory statute of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1313), under section 1200, Code of Civil Procedure, the actual value of the work and materials is not the test, but the value "estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price." Hoffman-Marks Co. v. Spires, 154 Cal. 111, 97 Pac. 152; Duffy Lumber Co. v. Stanton, 9 Cal. App. 38, 98 Pac. 38; Olson-Mahoney, etc., Co. v. Maxwell, 18 Cal. App. 668, 124 Pac. 100.

Appellants contend that the value of the work and materials as found by the court represented the actual value, and not the value estimated by the standard of the whole contract price, and that the court reached its estimate by a mathematical calculation, to wit, by dividing $31,397.50, the amount paid the contractors by .75, thus giving exactly the sum found, namely, $41,863.33. "Other than this mathematical calculation," it is claimed, "there is not a word of evidence to sustain the finding."

Witness Applegarth was the architect of the building, and made the estimates of the work as it progressed and issued certificates therefor. He testified:

"That $31,397.50 was three-fourths of the value, or possibly a little less than three-fourths of the value, of the portion of the work done by the Condon-McGlynn Company on the Dunne Building, estimated by the contract price for the whole. We were conservative always so as not to overstep the limit. So I am sure that it was not more than three-fourths of what they had done estimated by the price of the whole."

Again he testified:

"These certificates were our estimates of the value of the work done in the period covered by the certificate estimated by the contract price."

Again:

"We issued our certificates on the basis of three-fourths of the value of the work done estimated by the whole contract price."

He testified that he helped superintend the construction of the building, and was at that time more familiar with the cost of the work required to be done on the building than at the time he was testifying (two years later). He testified:

"In giving the certificates we investigated the cost of doing what had to be done there, and it was fresh in my mind when I gave the certificates, and the certificates I made at the time were my estimates at that time of three-fourths of the value of what had been done there, measured by the contract price for the whole. The contract price was less than the reasonable value of the contract for the building in my judgment."

He also testified:

"Leaving out the contract price of the Dunne Building under the Condon & McGlynn contract, the reasonable market value of what the Condon-McGlynn Company did before they ceased work there was about $47,000."

Later, in the course of the trial, the architect revised his estimate, reducing it from $47,000 to $35,736.50, whence by applying the rule in Hoffman-Marks Co. v. Spires, appellants derive $30,785 as the true value estimated on the basis of the contract price, and therefore it is claimed there was nothing subject to the lien.

Witness Charles Wright, who took the contract to complete the building, testified that the actual value at abandonment was $32,850. The testimony of this witness on cross-examination showed that he underestimated the cost of different parts of the work very materially, and that his figures given for various items entering into the cost of completing the building were unreliable, and for reasons shown his estimate of such cost did not represent the reasonable cost of completing the building under the original contract. It was alleged by defendants, in their verified answer to each of the complaints that they had paid to the contractors "a sum equal to 75 per cent. of the value of said work done and material furnished as estimated by the architect, and that the said sum was at no time more than 75 per cent. of the value of the work and materials already done and furnished, estimated by the standard of the whole contract price," and that the amount so paid was as already stated. Appellants say as to this averment in their answer that it "is not binding, in view of the fact that the evidence, as a whole, establishes that these payments were in reality 75 per cent. of the value of the amount actually in the building."

Section 1200, Code of Civil Procedure, directs that the value of the labor and materials done and furnished at the time of abandonment shall "be estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price." Any just method of arriving at this result may be adopted. There was evidence warranting the court in finding that the value of the labor done and materials furnished when abandonment occurred was greater than 75 per cent. of the value as estimated by the court, so that appellants cannot complain that the amount was excessive. Just to what mental or mathematical process the court resorted it seems to us immaterial if the result was justified. It may be, and probably was, the fact that the court was satisfied with the architect's testimony that the certificates given by him could safely be assumed as a basis for its finding, especially as he had testified that the value of the labor and materials done and furnished was $47,000, and in view also of the admissions of the answers as well as the architect's testimony that this 75 per cent. "was at no time more than 75 per cent. of the value of the work and materials already done and furnished, estimated by the standard of the whole contract price." The estimate made by the architect was not, as claimed by appellants, for actual value, but, as was admitted in the answers, and as testified by the architect, was a value "estimated by the contract price." We must assume that the court considered all the evidence in the case, and was, we think, justified therefrom in making the finding it did, although it happens to be, and probably was, based upon the architect's certificate. Finding 10, supra, is, we think, a finding of fact, and not a conclusion of law, as claimed by appellants.

It is further claimed that the court failed "to find the value of the work left undone," which, it is insisted, was essential "in estimating the amount subject to liens in cases where the contractor has not finished his contract." We understand our Supreme Court to have held that a finding as to the cost of completing the building is not necessary. Scheerer v. Deming, 154 Cal. 138, 97 Pac. 155; Ganahl v. Weinsveig, 168 Cal. 664, 143 Pac. 1025. In the Scheerer Case the court said it was proper as matter of evidence to consider this fact in determining what the value is. We must presume that the court did consider the evidence before it on this fact.

We come now to the attack made upon the several claims separately.

Olson-Mahoney Lumber Company's Claim.

The objections raised to this claim are: 1. That the complaint does not state a cause of action in this: (a) It shows that the lien was filed too late; (b) that it does not allege the value of the labor and materials in the building and on the ground at the time of the abandonment, based on the whole contract price or contain "even an allegation of a fund subject to liens"; (c) the complaint "fails to allege that the lien contained a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract," as required by section 1187, Code Civil Procedure. 2. That finding No. 6 is contrary to the admissions in the pleadings. 3. That the lumber charged for was used for concrete "forms," and did not form part of the building. 4. That there is a material variance between the complaint and lien, between the complaint and the evidence, and between the lien and the evidence.

It was alleged in the complaint that on July 20, 1909, the "said contract was abandoned before the completion thereof, and there was on said date an entire cessation of labor upon said unfinished contract and upon said unfinished building or structure," and on said date the defendant Dunne Investment Company entered into the occupation of said building, and ever since has been, and now is, in the use thereof; that said cessation from labor upon said contract and upon said unfinished building or structure and said use and occupation of said unfinished building by said owner, Dunne Investment Company, continued for a period of 30 days, and at the time of said cessation from labor there was in the hands of defendant Dunne Investment Company, after deducting the payments actually due and made under said contract for the value of the work and materials already furnished, estimated according to the whole contract price, sufficient to pay the claim and lien of the plaintiff herein. It is alleged that the notice of lien was duly verified and recorded December 14, 1909, and is made part of the complaint, "and was filed within the time allowed by law." It is also alleged that no notice of the cessation of work on the building or of abandonment of work was ever filed in the office of the recorder. The court found that there was an entire cessation of labor on the building on July 18, 1909, and that there never had been any notice of cessation of labor filed for record.

Several of the complaints alleged, and the court found, that within 30 days (in fact, within a few days) defendant "did enter upon said uncompleted building, exclude therefrom said Condon & McGlynn and all subcontractors, * * * and said defendant did proceed to procure other materials and labor, * * * and did complete said building * * * on November 16, 1909, and there was at no time a cessation of labor for 30 days on said building between said October 21, 1908, and said November 16, 1909."

Appellants say: If the allegation is true that there was a cessation of labor for 30 days after July 20, 1909, as alleged, the time for filing liens would commence to run August 19th, and the right to file a lien would, at most, expire 90 days thereafter. Hence the complaint did not state a cause of action, because, as therein stated, the lien was filed December 14th. Attention is also called to the allegation in the complaint that defendant entered into occupation and use of the building on July 20, 1909, which, it is claimed, brings the case directly within Robison v. Mitchel, 159 Cal. 581, 591, 114 Pac. 984.

[4, 5] While the court found, as alleged in the complaint, that there was a cessation of labor on July 18, 1909, it found, as we have seen, that no notice thereof had been filed of record, and the court also found that there was no cessation of labor for 30 days on said building, and the same was completed November 16, 1909. This plaintiff filed its lien on December 14, 1909, and was in time, if we may follow the findings of the court instead of the averments of the complaint. In considering this and other of the objections, it is to be noted that there was no demurrer to the complaint, no motion for nonsuit upon the close of plaintiffs' testimony, and no motion made for a new trial. In defendants' answer it was alleged that the contractors abandoned the work on July 15, 1909, "whereupon the said defendant entered upon the said work, excluded the said Daniel E. Condon and Chas. J. McGlynn and their men, and forthwith proceeded to procure other materials and labor and entered into another contract for said work, to wit, a certain contract with one Charles Wright," who agreed to complete the building according to the plans and specifications of the original contract. This contract was dated August 4, 1909, in which the contractor agreed "to enter upon the performance of the work on the 5th day of August, 1909, and to steadily proceed with and hasten the same to completion." The evidence showed that, in fact, there was no cessation of labor for a period of 30 days, that the contractor, Wright, carried out his contract, and in so doing must have been in possession of the building, and that defendant did not "enter into the occupation and use of the building" otherwise than to exclude the original contractors and to arrange for the completion of the building. No question was raised at the trial or objection to evidence as at variance with the pleadings. In this condition of the record we are fully warranted in disregarding the averment of the complaint that the cessation of labor continued for a period of more than 30 days and accepting the finding of the court. Appellant relies on Robison v. Mitchel, supra. In that case the complaint alleged and the answer confirmed the allegation, that the contractor ceased work on October 18th, and that the plaintiff thereafter, to wit, on November 19th, "undertook the completion of his said dwelling and proceeded to complete the same." The court held that the finding that "this cessation of labor did not continue for a period of 30 days" was not a finding within the issues, and, being "in conflict with the admissions of the pleadings, cannot be considered." In the case cited, however, "the owner filed for record his verified notice of cessation, as contemplated by the opening paragraph of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure," declaring in said notice that the work had been abandoned. It was admitted that the lien "was not filed within time if the notice of cessation and abandonment filed upon November 19, 1906, set running the statutory period for filing the lien." This was a case where the statutory notice had been given by the owner, and it undoubtedly started the running of the statutory period for filing the lien unless the facts were that the work had not ceased for that period and 10 days thereafter, as was alleged in the notice of abandonment. Under the peculiar facts of that case the trial court felt warranted in finding that there had not been a cessation of labor for the period of 30 days, thus disregarding the admissions of the pleadings, which the Supreme Court held was unauthorized. In the case here the finding has the support of uncontradicted evidence and of the admissions of the answer and the further very important fact that no notice of cessation of labor was given.* The case cited, it seems to us, not only fails to support appellants' contention, but rather demonstrates its fallacy.

[6] The complaint alleged as follows:

"At the time of said cessation from labor there was in the hands of the defendant Dunne Investment Company, after deducting the payments actually due and made under said contract for the value of the work and materials already done and furnished, estimated according to the whole contract price, sufficient money to pay the claim and lien of the plaintiff herein."

It is now urged against the sufficiency of this averment that it does not allege that defendant had "any fund subject to liens." Defendant states in its brief:

"It may be that this plaintiff intended to allege that it had in its hands and subject to liens sufficient money to pay the claim, but the complaint does not say so."

Had plaintiff's failure to express its intention been pointed out by special demurrer, no doubt the additional allegation would have been made. The record shows, however, that the fact here omitted constituted one of the issues tried without objection, which we think cured the defect.

[7, 8] The objection that the complaint "fails to allege that the lien contained a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract," as required by section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, is, we think, satisfactorily met. In the first place, the lien was admitted in evidence without the objection now urged being made. The complaint alleged that the notice of lien was filed, giving the date, and that it "contained, among other things, a description of the property thereby sought to be charged, as hereinbefore set forth, a statement of the names of the owners or reputed owners of said land and building or structure, to wit [giving the names], * * * and said notice also contained a correct statement of the demand of plaintiff for said materials furnished after deducting the just claims and offsets." It is then stated that the notice was duly recorded, and reference is made to it, and it is made part of the complaint. The lien contains a statement of the terms, time given, and the conditions of the contract. The complaint and notice of lien must be read together, as the latter is distinctly made part of the complaint. Newell v. Brill, 2 Cal. App. 61, 83 Pac. 76; Coss v. MacDonald, 111 Cal. 662, 44 Pac. 325. In the absence of a demurrer, and in view of the fact that no objection was made to the introduction of the lien in evidence, and that there was no denial in the answer of plaintiff's averments, the point, in our opinion, should not now be considered.

[9, 10] It is objected that there is a variance between the complaint and the lien, the complaint and the evidence, and between the lien and the evidence. The lien states that the contractors "requested claimant to furnish lumber and millwork for said building, and agreed to pay for the same upon its delivery; that claimant, at the special instance and request and in accordance with the agreement of said [contractors] furnished lumber and millwork for said building on the dates hereinafter mentioned to the amount and extent presented by the various sums set opposite the respective dates, viz.: [Then follow the items showing date, quantity of material and millwork, and price.] No time was given, and there were no other terms or conditions of the said contract." It is then stated that claimant performed its agreement "and supplied said lumber and materials as specified herein and said materials are of the reasonable value of $2,902.99, and the same were actually used in, upon, and about said building." The complaint alleged that for said lumber and millwork the contractors "agreed to pay the plaintiff the reasonable value thereof, in cash, and upon the delivery of said lumber and millwork; that no time was given, and there were no other terms or conditions to said contract except such as the law implies; * * * that the reasonable value of said lumber and materials is set opposite the respective dates as follows: [Then follow the items as in the notice of lien.] The evidence showed that the lumber was sold at a fixed price agreed upon with the contractors. "That the lumber and millwork furnished by the Olson-Mahoney Lumber Company for the building in question were furnished at the reasonable market price prevailing at San Francisco at the time the lumber and millwork were furnished." The introduction of the lien was objected to "on the ground that there is a variance between the evidence and the lien." In the decision rendered by this court in Barrett-Hicks Co. v. Glas, 14 Cal. App. 289, 111 Pac. 760, it was said in the opinion by Mr. Justice Hart:

"The object of the statute in requiring the conditions and terms of the contract to be set forth correctly in the notice of lien is to 'inform the owner as to the extent and nature of a lienor's claim, to facilitate investigation as to its merits.' * * * And the test as to the sufficiency of the notice with respect to the terms and conditions of the contract is whether such notice so far departs from the terms and conditions of the contract as to render it misleading to the injury of the owner. If it does, the variance is fatal. If, however, there is a substantial agreement between the contract and notice of lien, so that there could not arise in the mind of the owner any misapprehension as to the extent and nature of the lienor's claim, then any technical variance which might appear would be immaterial."

In that case the contention was that, while the complaint charged that plaintiff was "to receive for said materials [corrugated iron] the reasonable market value of the materials so furnished, the evidence shows that such corrugated iron was sold and furnished for a definite or stipulated price * * * agreed upon by the parties." Of this contention the court said:

"Conceding that the evidence shows that the price charged for the corrugated iron was definitely fixed and expressly agreed upon at the time it was sold to the contractor, it nevertheless further appears from the evidence that said price or sum constituted the market value of the materials at the time of the sale. 'The statement in the notice of lien was, therefore, substantially true, which was all that was required to give it validity.'"

In the present case it seems to us that any one reading the notice of lien would see that the agreement was that the materials were to be paid for upon delivery in accordance with the prices carried out against the various items, and that the materials were of the reasonable value as in the notice set forth; for it states that reasonable value was as the price shown. The complaint stated that the agreement was to "pay the plaintiff the reasonable value thereof in cash, and upon the delivery of said lumber and millwork." The evidence was that the prices were both the market value and the reasonable value, as well as that the agreement, was to pay a price agreed upon. We do not think that the notice of lien was insufficient, nor do we think there was any variance as claimed by appellant such as would justify a reversal of the judgment. See Blanch v. Commonwealth Am. Corp., 19 Cal. App. 720, 726, 127 Pac. 805, and cases there cited.

[11] It is next objected that the lumber furnished by plaintiff was used for concrete "forms" which did not enter into or become a part of the building, and hence no lien attached. Appellant rests its point in its opening brief upon the case of Stimson Mill Co. v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 141 Cal. 30, 74 Pac. 357. That case was decided in 1903, before concrete came into general use in the construction of buildings, and it involved conditions wholly unlike those connected with concrete structures. The contract was for the erection of a bridge to consist of five spans and the balance of steel or wood. Except as to the steel spans, the bridge was completed, but some delay arose in obtaining steel for the uncompleted part, and a temporary structure was agreed upon of timber over which the cars could run. "This structure rested upon planks laid on the ground, and was not in any way physically connected with the bridge, except that on it was laid the permanent track consisting of stringers, ties, and rails." It was soon after replaced by the steel structure originally contemplated, the "effect being to leave the track supported by the new steel structure in place of the wooden structure removed." Part of the lumber furnished by plaintiff went into this temporary structure and was afterwards carried away by the contractors; and it was claimed by defendant that plaintiff's claim of lien should be reduced by this amount. The lower court held otherwise, but the Supreme Court reversed the judgment. It was said in the opinion:

"It is settled by many decisions in this state that to entitle a materialman to a lien under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure the materials must be furnished to be used, and must be strictly used, in the construction of the building or other structure against which the lien is sought to be enforced [citing cases]; and this we understand means the materials must be used, not merely in the process of construction, but 'in the structure'—that is to say, they must be used as the materials of which it is constructed [citing cases]."

Strictly applied, the rule here laid down would exclude the lumber used for "forms" in constructing a concrete building; for it does not constitute a part of "the materials of which it is constructed." The question seems not to have been passed upon by our Supreme Court. Its wide application justifies its careful consideration.

The evidence was that this building could not have been erected without the use of lumber made into forms into which the concrete was poured there to remain until thoroughly "set"; that is, for a period requiring, as the evidence showed, from 15 to 20 days. The lumber was then removed, and was of no value thereafter. The evidence was that some of it was given away. None was used for another job, and the contractors advertised in the daily papers to get rid of it for firewood. The contract called for a reinforced concrete building to be erected by the use of wooden forms. The provision was:

"Forms must be constructed so as to properly sustain the total weight of the concrete floors and beams during construction without deflection, and shall be thoroughly braced and held in place to avoid any delay during construction to allow of the setting of the concrete."

After making specific provision as to how the lumber was to be used and what kind was required, the contract provided:

"Forms shall be so constructed that their inner surface shall conform strictly to the dimensions called for by the plans. * * * No form design shall be adopted or the lumber sizes collected [selected?] without the approval of the architect, and the architect's approval does not relieve the liability of the contractor for the strength of the forms."

We mention these provisions as showing the intimate connection of the "forms" with the erection of the structure and their indispensability.

In the case of Pacific Sash & Door Co. v. Bumiller, 162 Cal. 664, 667, 124 Pac. 230,

Cal.Rep. 158-161 P.—17

41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 296, where materials were furnished for the alteration of a building, it was held:

"Lard oil applied to the threads of joints of pipe used in the structure, insulated or covered electric wire used for drop lights attached thereto, paste for soldering joints, asbestos comprising a part of the electric switchboard, all constitute parts of the structure, and a lien may be asserted therefor. Some soapstone was used on the inside of pipes, as a lubricant, to facilitate the pulling of wires through the pipes. This being a part of the work of construction, we think it may also be considered as a part of the material used in construction, for which a lien may be claimed."

Soapstone as a lubricant constituted "no part of the materials of which the building was constructed," as was the test in the Stimson Mill Co. Case, supra, but it "was material used in the construction" of the building, which was the test in the Pacific Sash & Door Case, supra, and should, we think, be the test here. In thus holding we are but applying the familiar rule that the language of a statute must be construed so as to adapt it to changing conditions, the result of improved methods and the progress of inventive arts. In its reply brief appellant cites other cases in support of its contention. Kennedy v. Commonwealth, 182 Mass. 480, 65 N. E. 828, was an action by bill of equity which under the statute was maintainable "if the petitioner have a claim that might be a subject of mechanic's lien if the structure belonged to a private owner." The statute provided security "for all labor performed or furnished and for all materials used in such construction or repair." The contractors agreed to furnish material for and to construct all the concrete foundations and arches required for the construction of a pumping station and gatehouse at Spot pond, in Storeham. It appeared that the lumber "did not enter into the construction of the pumping station and gatehouse as a part of the permanent structure, but was bought and used again for a similar purpose in another place, and, after being so used several times, was removed by the purchasers, some of it being finally sold for firewood, and the rest being carried to the yard of the purchasers in Boston." It was held that plaintiff could not recover. "To acquire a lien for materials under the Pub. Sts. c. 191, it is necessary," said the court, "to show that the materials will form a part of the completed structure; that they will enter into it and become a part of the realty."

In Darlington Lumber Co. v. Westlake Const. Co., 161 Mo. App. 723, 141 S. W. 931, where the facts were substantially the same as in the present case, the St. Louis Court of Appeals deduced the following rule:

"Where certain material is provided for by the contract in erection of a structure, and is furnished and used accordingly, and is, either in whole or in part, consumed in its use, the materialman is entitled to a lien for the material thus consumed in the erection of the structure to the extent of the consumption of its reasonable value, regardless of the fact whether or not such material formed a permanent part of the structure when completed. Consumption of value means the depreciation in the market value of the material by the use provided for by the contract."

In Barker & Stewart Lumber Co. v. Marathon Paper Mills Co., 146 Wis. 12, 130 N. W. 866, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 875, the contract was to build a dam and materials were used in the construction of a temporary cofferdam the erection of which was necessary to the permanent dam. The contractor abandoned the work, and the owner took possession of the work, using for it the material left by the contractor including that in the cofferdam. About one-sixth of the material was destroyed by use, and the major portion of the planking when removed was capable of use in some other similar dam, and had at the time a market value of $4 or $5 per thousand, but after the removal the owner used it in tramways and in planking, and after the completion of such use it had no value except for firewood. At the completion of the work there would remain about 50 per cent. of the lumber furnished, a large share of which would be unfit for anything but fuel, and the balance fit for use only in other dams and worth about $5 per thousand. The planking cost $16 per thousand, and constituted about three-fourths of the lumber claimed. The hardware used in the cofferdam was of no value except as scrap iron. It was held that there was such a consumption of materials in the erection of the cofferdam as to entitle the materialman to a lien on the permanent dam under the statute giving a lien to a materialman who furnishes any materials "for, or in or about the construction, erection, repair," etc., of any structure which becomes a part of the freehold. Kennedy v. Commonwealth, supra, was much relied upon by appellant in that case, as to which the court said it was apparent that "the materials were regarded as appliances or tools." Said the court:

"So far as the concrete forms are concerned, we are inclined to agree that, where such forms are removed and are intended to be used, and in fact are used, again in other buildings, they should properly be regarded as appliances."

In speaking of the cases where the value of explosives used in preparing the ground or rock for the structure and liens have been granted, the court said:

"In these cases the liens have been granted upon one general principle or idea, namely, that where the material is used directly upon the work or structure itself, instrumental in producing the final result, and is actually consumed in the use, it may be said that in every true sense it has entered into and forms a part of the completed structure."

The opinion easily distinguishes the case from one where "coal is used in portable engines or oil in lubricating building machinery, or food eaten by the laborers." "They are at least one step further removed from the actual work of construction. They have neither physical contact nor immediate connection with the structure at any time."

The logic of the decision in cases where powder is used "does not," said the court, "depend upon the special character of the material, nor upon the extreme rapidity of its consumption, but upon the fact that it is consumed necessarily in the process of constructing the building or other structure, and that its life has gone into the fabric of the structure as effectually as has the stone or cement or the lumber which retains its existence as a part of the structure." The principal case as to explosives is Schaghticoke Powder Co. v. Greenwiche & Johnsonville Ry. Co., 183 N. Y. 306, 76 N. E. 153, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 288, 111 Am. St. Rep. 751, 5 Ann. Cas. 443. A lien was allowed in such a case in Giant Powder Co. v. San Diego Flume Co., 78 Cal. 193, 20 Pac. 419. The question, however, was not discussed. Judge McFarland dissented, stating, among other grounds, that:

A "materialman cannot have a lien for exploded powder after, like the 'unsubstantial pageant' in the Tempest, it has 'melted into air, into thin air.'"

B. F. Avery & Sons v. Woodruff & Cahill, 144 Ky. 227, 137 S. W. 1088, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 866, was a consolidated case in which it was agreed as to one of the claims that of the lumber used in forms for the concrete building being erected "nothing remained of any of said lumber but about 10 per cent., which was in a cut-up, sawed-up, and dirty condition, such remnants being the molds (forms) knocked to pieces." The Kentucky statutes provide:

"A person who performs labor or furnishes materials in the erection, altering, or repairing a house, building, or other structure, * * * or for the excavation of cellars * * * or for the improvement in any manner of real estate, * * * shall have a lien thereon."

The court said:

"If the lumber had been furnished to make a scaffold, molds, or forms with the intention of using them in the erection of that building and then carry them away and use them in constructing other buildings, then no lien would attach, as they would be regarded as a part of the appliances of the workmen, and would occupy the same place as a hammer, saw, or other tool used by the workmen, for which no lien is allowed by the statute (some states do, however, allow liens for scaffolding). These appellees furnished material to be used in the erection of a building, which was as necessary as the sand, cement, water, or other material. In fact, the building could not have been erected without lumber to be used for the purpose for which appellees' was furnished."

In a note the editor takes occasion to refer to Darlington Lumber Co. v. Westlake, supra, a Missouri case, and Barker & Stewart Lumber Co. v. Marathon Paper Mills Co., supra, the Wisconsin case, and, while saying that they are in the minority, remarks:

"They can hardly be cast aside and disregarded for that reason; for at this writing [1912] they are about the last words on this peculiar phase of the Mechanic's Lien Law, and are based upon a sound distinction which has always existed and whose observation [observance?] progress now makes desirable."

Further pursuit of the question is deemed unnecessary. We do not think a general rule could be safely stated to govern all cases where lumber is used in making forms for concrete work in the construction of work contemplated by the Mechanic's Lien Law. Each case must be governed by its own facts. This much, we think, however, can be said, and it is as far as the exigencies of the present case require: That, under the circumstances or facts shown, plaintiff is entitled to a lien for the materials it furnished and the millwork necessary for the preparation of such materials for use.

Western Building Material Company's Claim.

To this claim it is objected: (1) That the first two counts are contradictory, the first alleging an abandonment for 30 days on July 14, 1909, and the filing of a lien on September 15; (2) the second alleging that the contractors (not the defendant) completed the building, and that the lien was filed December 2, 1909. As to the first count it is pointed out that the court found against the cessation of labor for 30 days, and hence the lien was prematurely filed; as to the second count no cause of action is stated, "because there is no attempt whatever to allege a fund subject to lien"; that there is a material variance between the complaint and the lien and between the complaint and the evidence.

Respondent calls attention to the fact that the complaint was filed prior to the decision in Robison v. Mitchel, supra, under such decisions as Johnson v. La Grave, 102 Cal. 324, 36 Pac. 651, holding that the contract was deemed abandoned when there had been a cessation of work by the original contractor for a period of 30 days. After the decision in Robison v. Mitchel, a second lien was filed within 30 days after the completion of the building, "but only one suit was brought; both liens being pleaded as separate causes of action." The second lien was the one found by the trial court to be valid.

[12] It is true that the findings are contrary to the allegations of the complaint: (1) That there was an abandonment of work for 30 days on July 14, 1909; and (2) that the building was completed by the contractors. The court found against the averment as to cessation of work, and also found that the building was completed by defendant, and not by the contractors. But this was in strict accord with the averments of the answer many times repeated and in accord with averments in the complaints in the consolidated action. No pretense was made at the trial that the contractors completed the building, and it was not disputed at the trial that there was not a cessation of work for a period of 30 days. We do not think that contradictory averments in or statements not true in the complaint when at variance with the findings should be held fatal to recovery, where the answer cures the contradictions of misstatements, and the findings are, as alleged by the answer, supported by uncontradicted evidence. Allegations omitted or defectively stated may be cured or supplied by the defendant in its answer. 31 Cyc. 714; Bliss on Pleading, 437; Donegan v. Houston, 5 Cal. App. 626, 632, 90 Pac. 1073; Shively v. Semi-Tropic, etc., Co., 99 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 848. It would be a vain thing to reverse the judgment on these grounds in order that the respondent might amend its complaint to harmonize with what the answer admits. It is quite obvious that the alleged variance did not mislead the defendant to its prejudice.

[13] In this respondent's complaint there was a failure to allege a fund subject to liens. Respondent meets the objection by resort to allegations found in other complaints and by the considerations set forth under the Olson-Mahoney claim. This, we think, under the rule governing in a consolidated action, was allowable. This rule we understand to be that the effect of the order of consolidation is to unite the causes of action so as to constitute one cause of action and one pleading, and that allegations in one complaint will remedy defects and supply omissions in another.

In speaking of an issue in Union Lumber Co. v. Simon, 150 Cal. 751, 89 Pac. 1077, 1081, the court said:

"This issue affected the rights of each of the plaintiffs, and its presentation in any of the original complaints became an issue in the consolidated action, and the finding and judgment thereon operated in favor of all of the plaintiffs in the same manner as if they had originally joined as plaintiffs in bringing the action with this averment in their complaint." Wolters v. Rossi, 126 Cal. 644, 59 Pac. 143; Coghlan v. Quartararo, 15 Cal. App. 662, 115 Pac. 664.

[14] It is further urged that there is a variance between the complaint and the lien. The point is that the complaint relied on a contract for recovery. The averment is:

"That the following is a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of the plaintiff's contract under which it furnished said building materials, to wit: Said Condon-McGlynn Company, while working on said building or structure, ordered from plaintiff, for use in said building, and delivered the same and charged therefor the actual value and market rate thereof."

The lien sets forth the character of the materials and their value and that no part of the same has been paid, etc.:

"That the following is a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions on which said building material was furnished, to wit: From time to time while said Condon-McGlynn Company were engaged in the construction of said building its duly authorized agent ordered from claimant for use in said building said material, to wit, said crushed rock, and claimant furnished and delivered the same upon the order of said Condon & McGlynn Company, and charged therefor the sum of $650."

The lien says nothing about a contract, but the law implied a promise to pay. The complaint stated the facts the same way, but chose to say that the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract were, etc., and it then follows the lien. We cannot assume that the pleader meant a contract other than such as would be implied from the facts stated.

Ford & Malott Claim.

The only objection urged to this claim is that the allegation as to the work done and materials on hand at the cessation of work is insufficiently stated. What has been said in the preceding cases upon the point applies here.

Santa Cruz Portland Cement Company.

[15] As to this claim it is alleged that there is a material variance between the claim of lien and the evidence, and that its statements are inconsistent in this:

"It alleges that 2,042½ barrels of cement were furnished, which at $1.75, the contract price, would be $3,574.37½. But the lien alleges that the reasonable value was $3,849.68."

The lien states that respondent "furnished materials consisting of 2,042½ barrels of standard Portland cement of the reasonable value of $3,849.68, to be used," etc., under a certain written agreement. "Price. One dollar and seventy-five cents ($1.75) per barrel f. o. b. cars at factory." Shipments to be made "in car load lots as ordered by buyer." It was stated that "375 pounds net of cement, packed in four bags, constitute a barrel"; that the seller would pay 5 cents for each bag returned to the factories in good condition, seller to pay freight on returned bags; that no part of said $3,849.68 has been paid except the sum of $500, and there are no offsets except $29.25 due to said contractors for sacks returned, and there is now due and unpaid the sum of $3,320.43, etc.

The testimony was that respondent delivered to the contractors 2,042½ barrels of cement under the contract; "that the total price of the same was $3,849.68; that the reasonable value of said cement was $3,849.68." It appeared that 722½ barrels were furnished, not at the factory, as the contract called for, but from a warehouse in San Francisco, where respondent had it in storage; that the contractors were charged for all the cement at the rate of $1.75 per barrel, except as to the 722½ barrels there was added the freight from the factory to the city, $114.56, and warehouse charges, $16.25, and 5 cents each for 2,042 casks, $144.50; that the 722½ barrels were furnished from the warehouse at the contractors' request, and they agreed to pay therefor the contract rate of $1.75 per barrel, plus the freight, warehouse charges, and 5 cents for each sack; that 2,042½ barrels was all the cement ordered by the Condon-McGlynn Company, "and it was up to standard in every respect." The witness testified that there was due at the commencement of the suit $3,320.43, from which should be deducted for sacks returned $479.20, leaving due $2,841.23. It thus appears that respondent charged the contract price for the cement, $3,574.37, to which was added $275.31, being the freight and warehouse charges on the cement. The notice very clearly stated that the contract called for cement at an agreed price per barrel delivered at the factory f. o. b. cars. Nothing was said in the notice of lien of any other agreement or that delivery might be made at San Francisco at the contract price plus freight and warehouse charges. This arrangement as to part of the cement might have been equally advantageous to the contractors, and as between respondent and the contractors was proper enough, but the defendant had a right to rely upon the terms stated in the notice of lien; for the purpose of the lien is to inform defendant of the extent of the lienor's claim. The notice here informed the defendant that the contractor had agreed to pay $1.75 per barrel for the cement at the factory, but the owner was not informed that as to part of the cement a different agreement was made which, if enforced against defendant, would add materially to its liability. That all of the cement was not delivered at the factory is not material, as the price charged was the same at the factory and at San Francisco. The amount of respondent's claim, we think, should be ascertained without including the charges for freight and warehousing.

William Cronan Claim.

[16] The point made is that the allegation of the complaint is insufficient to support the judgment under section 1200, Code of Civil Procedure. This allegation is as follows:

"That at the time of said cessation from labor upon said unfinished contract and said unfinished building or structure there was in the hands of the said defendant Dunne Investment Company, after deducting the payments actually due and made on said contract between said defendant Dunne Investment Company and Daniel E. Condon and Charles J. McGlynn, as hereinbefore alleged for the value of the work and materials then already done and furnished, estimated according to the whole contract price, sufficient money to pay the claim and lien of plaintiff herein."

Whatever of insufficiency there may be in these averments it was cured by sufficient allegations in other complaints. It is further contended that the claim as allowed of $2,179.50 must be reduced to $1,714.

It appears that claimant had a specific contract for materials and work for the specific price of $3,165, and that up to July, 1909, when the work on the building was abandoned, the materials and work of claimant amounted to $2,179.50 on which no payment had been made. The notice of lien set out the contract as above stated, and that the labor and materials done and furnished under said contract at the cessation of work on the building was $2,179.50, which the lien states was the reasonable value "estimated according to the market value thereof, also measured according to said contract price." It appeared that after abandonment claimant made a contract with Charles S. Wright to complete the work originally contracted for by claimant, but at an increased compensation, the reason for which was fully explained. The witness testified:

"At the time of making out his claim of lien of $2,179.50, I took the same figures to make that item as I took in making the original bid," and "that the value of the materials already in at the time of the abandonment, based upon the contract price, was $2,179.50."

It was brought out on cross-examination of the witness that, if he had figured in making the original contract as he explained would have given him the real value of the job, "the estimate would have been the sum of \$4,018.18, but I made a contract for \$3,165; that the value of each item that I did would be the proportion that I estimated it based upon the proportion of \$3,165 to \$4,018.18." Upon this testimony appellant says that he "can claim only $\frac{3165}{4018}$ of the amount, or \$1,714." This contention is based upon what might have been, and not on what was the fact. We cannot see that respondent's contract with Wright to complete the work agreed upon originally cuts any figure. When the abandonment occurred respondent had done certain work and furnished certain materials under his contract, and, as was testified, "all of these materials were furnished to the building and actually used in the building, and that all the labor was used in preparing the materials and installing them in the building," and "that there were no materials on the ground at the time of the abandonment to his knowledge, and that none of the materials were hauled away after the abandonment." In this condition of the facts we think the finding of the court supported.

The Berger Manufacturing Company.

In alleging the value of the work which had been done, as stated in the first count, the complaint, it is claimed, omitted the element of proportion to the contract price, as also the amount paid; that the complaint alleged that on July 12, 1909, the contractors "ceased the construction of the building or structure, and never thereafter resumed the construction thereof," and there is no allegation of completion. But it was alleged that the lien was filed December 7, 1909, more than 120 days from the time of the cessation of labor as alleged. As to the second count in this complaint it is claimed that there is no allegation of any fund as required by section 1200, Code of Civil Procedure. These averments of the complaint as to the fund were not challenged for insufficiency. The facts as we have seen as to the cessation of labor, the taking over of the work by defendant soon thereafter, and the completion of the building are all hereinbefore pointed out, and, as we understand the decisions, all the plaintiffs may have the benefit of them.

The Vermont Marble Company Claim.

[17] It is claimed that the first count of the complaint does not state a cause of action, for the reasons urged to the complaint in the case of William Cronan. It is also objected to the second count of the complaint that it "does not allege that the lien contained a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract." The complaint states that the notice of lien was duly recorded, giving the page of record, and the lien was made part of the complaint, and contained a full statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract, and was received in evidence. It is true that the complaint does not set forth the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract, but it referred to the notice of lien, and alleged that it contained "a correct statement of the demand of plaintiff for said labor performed and said materials furnished after deducting all just credits and offsets," and, as remarked above, the lien was made part of the complaint.

Appellant relies upon Davis v. Treacy, 8 Cal. App. 395, 97 Pac. 78. Very properly the court said in that case: "The complaint is at least unique." It was held insufficient, on demurrer, to state a cause of action, because there was "absolutely nothing in the complaint to show what plaintiff's claim, or 'lien,' as he styles it, filed with the * * * recorder, contained, save the description of the property sought to be charged, or that it contained anything save such description." It does not appear that the lien was made part of the complaint, and, as the court said, it "utterly fails to show a compliance with the provisions of section 1187, C. C. P., and for this reason fails to set forth a cause of action for the foreclosure of a mechanics' or laborers' lien."

In the present case there was no demurrer to the complaint. The only objection to the lien as evidence was that there was a material variance between the lien pleaded, and that the lien was filed too late, both of which objections were properly overruled. It is very certain that no prejudice accrued to defendant from the alleged omission of allegations in the complaint, and on the evidence but one judgment could have been rendered. We think section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, framed in accordance with section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution, should apply in this case. See Vallejo & Northern R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238.

As to the claims of J. P. M. Phillips and Bay Development Company the objections have been considered in other cases.

[18, 19] Finally, the claim of the San Francisco Teaming Company is attacked: First, because the complaint does not contain any allegation of abandonment. This objection has been previously noticed, and it was shown that other complaints contained ample allegations as to the fact, as well also the answers, and, besides, the findings are clear upon the point. Second, it is urged that the lien does not state the terms, time given, or conditions of the contract as shown by the contract, and there is a material variance between the lien and the evidence, citing Cal. P. C. Co. v. Wentworth, 16 Cal. App. 713, 118 Pac. 103, 113. The lien states that Condon-McGlynn Company "entered into a contract on or about the 1st day of December, 1908, for labor as aforesaid, sand and material for said building with said San Francisco Teaming Company, the claimant herein, by which said labor, sand, and material were furnished, and the following is a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of said contract, to wit: Said claimant agreed to furnish certain labor, sand, and material for said building; that said labor, sand, and material were to be paid for in cash upon demand at any time after said labor had been performed and at any time after said sand and material had been delivered; that said sand and material were delivered," etc.; "that the total amount of the claim of San Francisco Teaming Company for sand, labor, and material furnished as aforesaid is $631.12; that $300 has been paid on account thereof; and that the sum of $331.12 is still due, owing," etc. The lien contained no statement as to the price to be paid for the sand or materials except as above. The points made are: (1) That the evidence showed an agreement for sand at $1 per load and teams at the ruling market rate, and hence the lien does not contain a statement of the terms of the contract; (2) the variance between the allegations of the lien and the evidence is a material one.

Witness Donaldson, respondent's bookkeeper, testified that there was an agreement to "supply them with sand at $1 a load; teams at the running rate that was in existence at that time." Later in his testimony he corrected the above statement, and testified that he knew of no specific price agreed upon, that most of the details were handled through him, but that he had no recollection of the price being mentioned. The substance of this witness' testimony was that the contractors verbally as needed ordered teams and sand, and charges were made "at the running rates"—the "ordinary market running rate." Witness Condon, one of the contractors, testified that he did not remember that there was a written contract with respondent, but that the understanding was verbal; the sand was to be delivered "at so much a load, depending on the haul, the minimum would be $1 a load"; that there was no particular agreement as to the price the teams were to be paid; that the day after hauling a statement would be made, and, if the price "showed too high a price, it was sent back for correction"; the price payable for sand depended upon the distance it was hauled, and the teams were to be paid "the current rate" and "$1 a yard for hauling the sand a reasonable distance." The bills from time to time were made out, as we understand the testimony, "at the running rates" for the sand and teaming, amounting to $631.12, of which $300 was paid, leaving a balance of $331.12. We think it fairly inferable from the testimony that the contract such as existed was an implied one, and that payment was to be made upon the performance of the labor or delivery of the sand, and both were to be paid at "the going rates" which the testimony established. The real question then is: Is the notice of lien fatally defective in not stating the terms of payment or price at which the labor was to be done and the sand to be furnished? As the facts appear, the price could not have been stated, since no price was agreed upon. The contractors simply gave orders for the teams and sand as required, and the obligation on their part was such as the law would imply. Such an implied obligation would clearly arise to pay on delivery or performance by respondent, and it would seem to us that there would also arise an implied obligation to pay the current or going rates for the labor or materials thus furnished.

In the case of Blanck v. Commonwealth A. Corp., 19 Cal. App. 720, 726, 127 Pac. 805, it appeared "in some instances that no price was agreed upon," but, as it appeared that the price was the reasonable value, the omission was held not to be fatal. There is in the present case no direct and specific statement that the price was reasonable, but we think when labor is done or materials furnished at the current or going rates, or, in other words, the market rates, it may be assumed that they were reasonable in absence of any evidence to the contrary.

Section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, requires of the lienor that he make a statement in the notice "of the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract." The notice gave the terms as cash, and as to the time payment was to be on delivery of the materials or performance of the labor. Full and literal compliance with the statute would have required a statement that the price to be paid was the current or market rate at the time for the labor and materials. But as, in fact, this is what was claimed and what was understood by the parties, and would be implied as the contract in the absence of a specific agreement otherwise, we are unwilling to hold that the omission in the notice was fatal to its validity. Barrett-Hicks Co. v. Glas, supra.

The lien adjudged in favor of the Santa Cruz Portland Cement Company for the sum of $2,760.80 should be reduced by the sum of $275.31; otherwise the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, T. L. Lewis, and W. R. Guy, Judges.

Proceeding by the People of the State of California, on the relation of U. S. Webb, Attorney General, and D. V. Mahoney, against Spencer M. Marsh, to determine the title to the office of District Attorney of San Diego County. From a judgment for defendant, the relators appeal. Affirmed.

Henning & McGee, of San Diego, for appellants. Luce & Luce, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The purpose of this proceeding was to determine the title to the office of district attorney of San Diego county.

It appears from findings of the court as to which there is no controversy: That on June 22, 1915, D. V. Mahoney was the duly elected, qualified, and acting district attorney of San Diego county; that on said date he signed and delivered to C. H. Swallow, a member of the board of supervisors of said county, his resignation of the office of district attorney, a copy of which document is as follows:

"June 22, 1915. To the Honorable Board of Supervisors of the County of San Diego, State of California—Gentlemen: I hereby tender to your honorable body my resignation from the office of district attorney of the county of San Diego, state of California, and ask that the same be accepted and take effect on the filing of this my resignation with the clerk of the board of supervisors of the county of San Diego, state of California. D. V. Mahoney, District Attorney of the County of San Diego, State of California."

That at about 7:30 o'clock p. m. on said June 22d, Swallow went to the home of B. Allen, who was a deputy county clerk and acting clerk of the board of supervisors, to whom he delivered said resignation so received by him from Mahoney, upon which said Allen at the time indorsed the words: "Filed June 22, 1915, J. T. Butler, Clerk, By B. Allen, Deputy." And on the following morning, June 23d, upon reaching the county clerk's office where she was employed as such deputy, she delivered the document to J. T. Butler, county clerk and ex officio clerk of the board of supervisors, who retained the same in his custody until June 28, 1915, at which time it was presented to a special meeting of the board of supervisors duly convened pursuant to a call therefor, notice of which as served stated that it was "for the purpose of considering and accepting the resignation of D. V. Mahoney as district attorney and, if accepted, appointing his successor"; at which time, all the members of the board being present, the resignation of Mahoney was accepted, and the respondent, Spencer M. Marsh, was elected to fill the vacancy. At this meeting of the board of supervisors so held on June 28th, and before the board had taken any action with regard to said resignation or the election of Marsh to fill the vacancy, Mahoney caused to be served on the board and each member thereof a written notice of revocation, stating therein that he withdrew and recalled the resignation theretofore tendered. In addition to these facts as to which, as stated, there was no controversy, the court upon conflicting evidence, ample in tendency, however, to support the same, found that the delivery of said resignation by Swallow to the clerk and the filing thereof was in obedience to the instructions of Mahoney given to Swallow when the document was delivered to him, and that at the time Mahoney was mentally competent and well knew the purport and effect of the same and intended the resignation to go into effect according to the terms thereof. As a conclusion of law, the court found in effect that the resignation was duly made to the clerk of the board of supervisors of said county and became effective on June 23, 1915, by reason of which a vacancy existed in the office of district attorney of said county; that Spencer M. Marsh was duly elected to fill the vacancy on June 28, 1915, on which date he was and ever since has been entitled to said office by virtue of said election.

Judgment followed for the respondent, from which the relator appeals.

[1] Appellant's chief contention is that the question presented must, under section 4468 of the Political Code, be determined by applying the common-law rule which denied the right of a public officer to resign his office without the consent of the appointing power manifested by an express acceptance of the resignation or in some other mode equally significant of its intention so to do (Mechem on Public Officers, § 414; Throop on Public Officers, § 409; Edwards v. United States, 103 U. S. 471, 26 L. Ed. 314; Reiter v. Durrell, 51 Ohio St. 74, 36 N. E. 943, 23 L. R. A. 681); and, if this be true, it follows, says appellant, there was no vacancy, since, before the resignation was accepted, Mahoney, as he had a right to do (People v. Porter, 6 Cal. 26; People v. Board of Police, 26 Barb. [N. Y.] 487; State v. Murphy, 30 Nev. 409, 97 Pac. 391, 720, 18 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1210), recalled and withdrew his letter of resignation. Section 4468 of the Political Code, however, declares the common law to be the rule of decision only in those cases where it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or Constitution or laws of this state. Conceding the common-law rule as stated, which it may be noted was based upon a theory not in harmony with but entirely at variance with the modern idea which prevails as to a public office, and conceding also, where acceptance is necessary to render the resignation effective, the right of a public officer who has tendered his resignation to recall it at any time before it is accepted, we are nevertheless of the opinion that such rule has been abrogated in this state by statutory provisions. Webster defines the word "resign," "to give up an office or trust"; and defines "resignation" as being "the act of resigning or giving up, as a claim, possession or position." Section 996 of the Political Code declares that: "An office becomes vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term: (1) The death of the incumbent. (2) * * * (3) His resignation. * * *

Now, since resignation means, as stated, the act of giving up a claim, possession, or position, it seems to clearly follow, under this provision of the statute, that a vacancy arises when the incumbent resigns in the mode provided by law, subject of course to the terms contained in the letter of resignation. Section 995 of the Political Code declares the mode in which a public officer may resign his office, namely, that it must be in writing, and, if the incumbent be a county officer not commissioned by the Governor, that it shall be made to the clerk of the board of supervisors. In the case at bar it was in writing, and since it was, as intended to be by appellant, delivered to and filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors, it was made in full compliance with the statute. We are aware that authorities may be found which appear in conflict with this conclusion. Reference to them, however, shows they were based upon the finding of the court that no statute existed upon the subject changing the common-law rule, such as Edwards v. United States, supra, a Michigan case, where it was held the common-law rule prevails. The case of State ex rel. Royse v. Superior Court of Kitsap County, decided by the Supreme Court of Washington, 46 Wash. 631, 91 Pac. 4, involved a statute identical with section 996, Political Code, of this state, under which the court, after reviewing the authorities from a number of states, held that the common-law rule prevailed in that state. After referring to section 1548 of the Washington Code (Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St.) corresponding with said section 996 of our Code, the court said:

"We see nothing in the above which changes the common-law rule. It is true it is declared that an office shall become vacant upon the resignation of the incumbent, but nothing is said about the method of effecting a resignation. (Italics ours.) The silence of the statute in that regard should be construed to mean that the established common-law method still obtains."

It will be noted that our statute, section 995, Political Code, in express terms declares the method of effecting a resignation which, according to the Supreme Court of Washington, was wanting in the laws of that state. A number of authorities are cited by respondent in support of the contention that the acceptance of a resignation is not necessary to create a vacancy, but that the vacancy is created by the act of the public officer by delivering his written resignation to the appointing power or official authorized by law to receive the same for such depository. Among the early cases so holding is that of People v. Porter, 6 Cal. 26, where it is said:

"The tenure of an office does not depend upon the will of the executive, but of the incumbent. * * * There can be no doubt that a civil officer has a right to resign his office at pleasure, and it is not in the power of the executive to compel him to remain in office. * * *

Notwithstanding the fact that this case has been frequently accepted by the courts of other states as an authority in support of the proposition, it is claimed, not without ground therefor, that what was there said upon the subject was not necessary to a determination of the case, and therefore dictum. In a Wisconsin case (State v. Kotecki, 155 Wis. 66, 144 N. W. 200), where it was contended that a resignation without an acceptance does not vacate an office, the court, after stating that counsel for defendant cites many cases holding the contrary, continues:

"Fortunately section 962, Stats. 1911, settles the controversy. It provides: 'Every office shall become vacant on the happening of either of the following events: (1) The death of the incumbent. (2) His resignation.' * * * So it must be held that upon the filing of the resignation of the relator the office was vacated."

Our conclusion is based, not upon the authorities, concededly conflicting, bearing upon the question, but upon the fact, as declared in section 4 of the Civil Code, that:

"The Code (sections 995 and 996, Political Code) establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions are to be liberally construed with a view to effect its objects."

Thus construed, we entertain no doubt that the provisions referred to gave appellant "the privilege of resignation as an absolute right, without any restrictions" (State v. Murphy, 30 Nev. 409, 97 Pac. 391, 720, 18 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1210), and his resignation delivered to the officer designated (by law) to receive it, he having no duty to perform in supplying a successor, the mere receipt thereof by such officer rendered it effective and created a vacancy in the office as intended by him, immediately upon being filed with, that is, delivered to, the clerk of the board of supervisors, which occurred several days before the time of the recall and withdrawal thereof. U. S. v. Justices of Lauderdale County (C. C.) 10 Fed. 460, and cases cited.

According to our view of the case, it is unnecessary to further review and distinguish the authorities cited by the respective parties as bearing upon the proposition submitted. Necessarily they involve the statutes of the states in which the cases arose.

[2] By its terms the resignation was to take effect upon being filed with the clerk. No express provision is made in the law providing that a letter of resignation shall be filed; but, like documents which are required to be filed, the delivery thereof to the clerk of the board of supervisors, he being the officer designated by section 995 of the Political Code to whom the resignation should be made, constituted the filing thereof. In practice the filing of a document, so far as concerns the act of the party, consists simply in placing the paper in the hands of the clerk to be preserved and kept by him in his official custody as an archive or record of which his office is the repository, subject to such use and reference thereto as the nature of the document contemplates. While it is usual for the clerk to indorse such document, giving the date of its delivery, such file marks are but evidence of the fact of such delivery. In Tregambo v. Comanche M. and M. Co., 57 Cal. 501, it is said:

"A paper in a case is said to be filed when it is delivered to the clerk and received by him, to be kept with the papers in the cause. * * * Filing a paper consists in presenting it at the proper office, and leaving it there, deposited with the papers in such office."

And in Edwards v. Grand, 121 Cal. 254, 53 Pac. 796, it is said:

"An instrument is 'filed' for record when it is deposited in the proper office, with a person in charge thereof, with directions to record it."

Here, there was no cause, and hence no other papers; nor is there any provision requiring the resignation to be recorded. Hence the filing was complete when it was delivered to the proper officer and by him received for the purpose for which it was intended. Neither is the alleged fact that the clerk, for purposes of his own, suppressed information that Mahoney had resigned, nor the fact that three members of the board of supervisors in calling the special meeting stated that it was for the purpose of accepting Mahoney's resignation, of any weight in determining the question, since, under the foregoing views, it is obvious that neither the clerk by his acts, nor the board of supervisors, could compel the incumbent to retain the office against his will.

[3] Appellant cites section 879 of the Political Code, declaring that "every officer must continue to discharge the duties of his office, although his term has expired, until his successor has qualified," and, basing his argument thereon, insists there could be no vacancy, since under the provisions of this section appellant was required to continue in office until his successor was qualified. As well suggested by the trial judge:

"Counsel's argument would lead to the conclusion that there could be no vacancy until a successor was appointed, and there could be no successor appointed until there was a vacancy."

While there appears to be a conflict of authority as to whether such provision as that contained in section 879 is applicable in the case of a resignation of a public officer where, to complete the same, no acceptance thereof is required, the decisions of our own Supreme Court seem to justify the conclusion that the provision applies not only to one whose term has expired, but as well where the incumbency is ended by resignation; the continuance in office being regarded as temporary, or, as stated in People v. Ward, 107 Cal. 236, 40 Pac. 538:

"He is a makeshift merely, locum tenens, temporarily filling a public office which it is inexpedient to permit to stand without an incumbent."

To the same effect is People v. Nye, 9 Cal. App. 148, 98 Pac. 241.

Hence, conceding that one who has tendered his resignation in the mode prescribed by statute to take effect immediately, or, as here, upon the delivery of the document to the clerk, may nevertheless hold over until his successor is appointed, such fact is not inconsistent with the theory that a vacancy exists in the office to be filled by the appointing power.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

CROWLEY v. SAVINGS UNION BANK & TRUST CO. (Civ. 1477.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 20, 1916.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚭47(1)—CONTRACT AND CONVEYANCE—STATUTE.

By Civ. Code, § 158, either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other respecting property which they might if unmarried, and a husband may convey realty or personalty to his wife.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚭262(2) — WIFE'S INTEREST IN INVESTMENT—STATUTES.

Under Civ. Code, § 686, providing that every interest created in favor of several persons in their own right is an interest in common, and section 164, providing that whenever property is conveyed to a married woman by instrument in writing the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property, and that when property is conveyed to a married woman and her husband the presumption is that the married woman takes as tenant in common, where a husband, with consent of his wife, drew money from their joint savings bank account with a mutual understanding that the wife had the same interest in the money as he did, which understanding found expression in the notes received by him for the loan of the money to a third person, which were made payable to both his wife's order and his own, whether the husband intended to transmute the money into separate or community property was immaterial; there being a presumption that the wife's interest in the investment was that of a tenant in common.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚭133(1) — TENANCY IN COMMON OF NOTES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a widow's action against a savings bank to obtain a decree adjudging her to be the owner of an undivided one-half interest in notes and mortgages, evidence held sufficient to support findings that plaintiff was the owner of such an interest as her separate property; the bank, as executor of her deceased husband, being the owner of a like interest.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚭1170(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, and Code Civ. Proc. § 475, providing that judgment shall not be reversed for harmless error, in a widow's action for a decree adjudging her to be the owner of an undivided one-half interest in notes and mortgages, where it appeared, without contradiction, that the money, which was the consideration for the loans, was impressed with the character of joint ownership by the contract under which it was deposited with defendant bank by the widow and her deceased husband, that the widow consented to its being drawn out and loaned, etc., error allowing her to testify to her husband's declaration that the money belonged to her as much as to him was not ground for reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by Katherine S. Crowley against the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company, individually, as executor of the last will and testament of Timothy J. Crowley, deceased, and as trustee under the last will of the decedent. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Judgment affirmed.

W. H. Chapman and Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for appellants. O'Gara & De Martini and Bert Schlesinger, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action was brought to obtain a decree adjudging plaintiff to be the owner of an undivided one-half interest in two certain promissory notes and mortgages and directing the sale of said notes and mortgages and the payment to plaintiff of one-half of the proceeds of said sale and one-half of all interest collected and to be collected. The promissory notes, the subject of the action, were as follows: A note of date February 29, 1912, executed by Herman D. Hogrefe and Bertha L. Hogrefe, for the sum of $15,000, payable to the order of T. J. Crowley and Catherine Crowley, secured by mortgage on real estate. Also, a note of date July 16, 1912, executed by J. B. Bocardre Drayage Company, a corporation, for the sum of $18,000, payable to the order of T. J. Crowley and Katherine S. Crowley, secured by mortgage on real estate.

Subsequently to the commencement of the action, as appears by a supplemental complaint, there was paid on the Hogrefe note the sum of $14,000 to defendant Savings Union Bank & Trust Company in its individual capacity, of which sum one-half was paid to defendant Savings Union Bank & Trust Company as executor of the last will of Timothy J. Crowley, deceased. The balance, $7,000, was retained by it to await the determination of the ownership thereof by the court.

On January 5, 1909, T. J. Crowley and Katherine Crowley opened an account with the San Francisco Savings Union designated as No. 131260. This corporation afterwards changed its name to Savings Union Bank & Trust Company, but the account continued under the same number. The account above referred to was opened pursuant to the following contract:

"San Francisco, Cal., Jan'y. 5, 1909.

"To the San Francisco Savings Union: All moneys now on deposit, or at any time hereafter deposited by or for us or either of us, to the credit of Timothy J. Crowley or Katherine, wife, or'dy. deposit account No. 131260, with the dividends thereon and accumulations thereof, are, and shall be, the joint property (with right of survivorship) of the undersigned, and are payable to us or either of us, or to the survivor of us, or to the executors, administrators or assigns of such survivor, without reference to the original ownership of such moneys, the act of so depositing said moneys, being absolute termination of any original ownership thereof; and are subject to all national and state laws, governing such moneys, now or hereafter in force.

"This account may be terminated at any time by the board of directors of said San Francisco Savings Union; and the opening of this account is sufficient and complete evidence of the acceptance and ratification by said San Francisco Savings Union of the terms of deposit herein set forth, without other or further action on its part.

"[Signed]

T. J. Crowley,
"Katherine Crowley."

This contract remained with the bank from the day of its date until the action was tried, and under its provisions large and small sums of money were deposited with the bank to this account, and both Mr. and Mrs. Crowley individually withdrew money as required by either or both from time to time until Mr. Crowley's death, January 21, 1913. The facts in connection with the execution of this contract and the view this court entertains of its purpose and the intention of the parties in executing it were fully discussed in the action bearing like title to the present action and numbered Civil No. 1476, decided March 16, 1916. Crowley v. Savings Bank & Trust Co., 157 Pac. 516. In that action the question involved was as to the ownership of the balance of the fund remaining on deposit to this account at the death of Mr. Crowley, and we held that this balance passed to Mrs. Crowley by right of survivorship. We also held that the declarations found in the will of Mr. Crowley were inadmissible as evidence of an intention other than that expressed in the deposit agreement. These questions we regard as settled and need not be considered in this opinion.

The case now here calls for a decision as to whether or not Mrs. Crowley is entitled to a one-half interest in the promissory notes or their proceeds above referred to. The facts upon which she rested her claim there-to are briefly as follows: When the Hogrefe note was executed there stood to the credit of this joint account the sum of $37,241.63. For some reason not appearing, but for temporary purposes, the Crowleys jointly gave their one day promissory note to the bank for $15,000 and, as the transcript shows, "transferred to the credit of the cashier of the Savings Union & Trust Company $15,000 from our term deposit No. 131260, with the agreement that upon payment of said note, according to its tenor said amount shall be retransferred to our said deposit account." This amount was loaned to Hogrefe, and he and his wife executed and delivered their note payable to the order of Mr. and Mrs. Crowley. Five days later a deposit was made to this joint account, and the bank retransferred to that account $15,000 and canceled the Crowley note.

The money for the Bocarde Drayage Company note was drawn from the said joint account, as was stipulated, "upon checks signed by Timothy J. Crowley alone, but that said moneys were so withdrawn with the consent of said Katherine Crowley." Both notes, as above stated, were made payable to Timothy J. Crowley and one to Catherine Crowley and the other to Katherine Crowley or order and so remained until Mr. Crowley's death. They were kept in his safe deposit box to which Mrs. Crowley had a key. She testified that she was consulted by her husband as to the advisability of making the loans and consented thereto; that he told her she "had just as much right to know where the money was as he had, and he wanted me to be pleased; * * * that it was the joint money; that it belonged to me as much as it did to him. Q. Did you read the note (referring to the $18,000 note)? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where was the property that you inspected? A. On Bryant; Bryant and White Place. I accompanied my husband at that time. Q. Did Mr. Crowley tell you that there were mortgages made to secure the payment of the notes? A. Yes, sir. The notes were put in the safe deposit box to which I had access. At all times I knew that both of these notes were made payable to me and my husband." Defendants objected to "any declaration which passed between the lady and her husband during the existence of the marriage relation as privileged" under section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure. The court overruled the objection, and this is the only alleged error occurring at the trial in the admission or rejection of testimony and the only ruling to which objection is made except in refusing to admit the Crowley will in evidence.

Upon the principal question in the case, the court made the following findings of fact:

"(1) That prior to and at the time of the death of Timothy Jay Crowley, plaintiff Katherine S. Crowley and Timothy Jay Crowley were the owners, as tenants in common, of these two certain notes and mortgages that are described in the complaint in the above-entitled action; and each of them was the owner of an undivided one-half of said two notes and mortgages as her and his separate property respectively. That, since the death of said Timothy Jay Crowley, plaintiff has been and now is the owner of the undivided one-half of said two notes and mortgages as her separate property; and said Savings Union Bank & Trust Company, as trustee under the last will and testament of said Timothy Jay Crowley, deceased, has been and now is the owner of the other undivided one-half of said two notes and mortgages, to wit, the undivided one-half of said two notes and mortgages held by said Timothy Jay Crowley in his lifetime.

"* * * (8) That at the time of his death said Timothy Jay Crowley was not and prior thereto had not been the owner of both or either, or any of the notes and mortgages described in the complaint as his separate property and estate, or otherwise. That said Timothy Jay Crowley at no time was the owner of any interest in said notes and mortgages except an undivided one-half interest in and to each of said notes and mortgages, as his separate property and estate. That defendant Savings Union Bank & Trust Company, as executor of the last will and testament of Timothy Jay Crowley, deceased, is entitled to the possession of said notes and mortgages as cotenant thereof with plaintiff and not otherwise."

By its judgment the court awarded plaintiff the relief prayed for, except that it was adjudged to the best interests of the parties "not to order a sale of said promissory notes and mortgages or either of them at the present time, but to allow the parties to proceed to collect said notes and mortgages by suit or otherwise, reserving in this court full power to appoint a referee and to order a sale and a division of the proceeds thereof according to the interests of the parties as determined in this action whenever it shall be made to appear that a sale of said notes and mortgages or any of them would promote the interests of the parties." The appeal is from this judgment.

Had Mr. Crowley drawn out the money on his own initiative and loaned it to his own account, taking the notes to himself or order, a question might have arisen not now involved. He did not do this. On the contrary, the money was drawn from the bank by mutual consent and with a mutual understanding that Mrs. Crowley had the same interest in the money to be loaned as he did, and this understanding found expression in the notes themselves by being made payable to the order of both Mr. and Mrs. Crowley. Section 686 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

"Every interest created in favor of several persons in their own right is an interest in common, unless acquired by them in partnership, for partnership purposes, or unless declared in its creation to be a joint interest, as provided in section six hundred and eighty-three, or unless acquired as community property."

"An interest in common is one owned by several persons not in joint ownership or partnership." Civ. Code, § 685.

Section 161, Civil Code, provides that "a husband and wife may hold property as joint tenants, tenants in common, or as community property," and section 164 provides that:

"Whenever any property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property. And in case the conveyance be to such married woman and to her husband, or to her and any other person, the presumption is that the married woman takes the part conveyed to her, as tenant in common, unless a different intention is expressed in the instrument."

[1] In this state, either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other respecting property which they might if unmarried. Civ. Code, § 158. A husband may convey real or personal property to his wife, and it was held, in Carter v. McQuade, 83 Cal. 274, 278, 23 Pac. 348, 349, that:

"Whether the property conveyed be his separate property or community property, the presumption is that it thereby becomes and is thereafter to be treated as her separate property." (Citing cases.)

The following cases deal with section 164 Civil Code, and the presumption therein declared as to the wife receiving title to property by written instrument: Alferitz v. Arrivil- laga, 143 Cal. 646, 77 Pac. 657; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 282, 104 Pac. 308; Shaw v. Bernal, 163 Cal. 262, 124 Pac. 1012.

[2] Whether Mr. Crowley intended to transmute this money into separate or community property it seems to us immaterial, for whatever character it assumed when taken out of the bank it was immediately invested in the names of himself and wife, and we think the presumption followed that her interest in the investment was that of a tenant in common, for he expressly so provided by causing or allowing the notes and mortgages to be made payable to himself and wife.

In commenting upon section 164, the court said, in Volquards v. Myers, 23 Cal. App. 505, 138 Pac. 964:

"It is true that the presumption established by section 164 of the Civil Code is not conclusive, but may be disputed and overthrown by other testimony. Nevertheless, however, the presumption is itself evidence which may outweigh the positive testimony of witnesses against it, and will stand as evidence in the case until it is overcome by other testimony (citing cases); and whether, in any case, a disputable presumption has been dispelled by testimony received in rebuttal thereof, is a question whose solution is solely with the trier of the facts."

[3] There was no evidence offered in rebuttal of the presumption in the present case unless the declaration of Mr. Crowley may be so regarded found in his will which was executed about a year after the Hogrefe note was given and about six months after the execution of the other note, and this we held in the former case, supra, was inadmissible. Aside from the investments themselves, whatever testimony is found in the record was given by Mrs. Crowley and tended to aid the presumption rather than rebut it. We think the foregoing findings were supported by the evidence.

[4] The only remaining question relates to the alleged error in permitting Mrs. Crowley to testify as to statements made by her husband in relation to the loan of this money.

Counsel for both parties have with much industry collected the authorities pro and con the ruling. It does not seem to us necessary to decide the point. Mrs. Crowley's testimony is uncontradicted as are certain important facts connected with the transaction otherwise appearing. It thus appeared without contradiction that the money which was the consideration for these loans was impressed with the character of joint ownership by the contract under which it was deposited with the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company; that Mrs. Crowley consented to its being drawn out and loaned to the makers of the notes and mortgages; that she joined in the note given to the bank temporarily when the loan was made to Hogrefe; that she visited and inspected the mortgaged property before the loan was made to Hogrefe; that she knew of the money being drawn for and consented to the making of the loan to the Bocarde Draying Company; that the notes and mortgages were given to Mr. and Mrs. Crowley jointly and were kept in a safe deposit box to which Mrs. Crowley had access by a key which she carried. It is inconceivable that these facts were unknown to her husband, or that the transactions were consummated otherwise than with his full knowledge and consent. If it be conceded, for the purpose only of this opinion, that it was error to allow Mrs. Crowley to testify to her husband's declaration that the money belonged to her as much as to him, we cannot say that such error caused a miscarriage of justice. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc.; section 4½, art. 6, Const. This declaration by Mr. Crowley was not necessary to strengthen the presumption which the law attached to his acts. Everything he did goes to show beyond dispute that the fact was exactly what he declared it to be to his wife. It seems to us that it would be a gross miscarriage of justice to reverse the judgment for an alleged error in admitting evidence which was not essential to any finding of fact by the court and without which the findings are amply supported.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1060(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

In an action for personal injuries, where plaintiff's counsel several times, in examining a prospective juror and one of defendant's witnesses, referred to the fact that defendant was indemnified against an adverse verdict by a surety company, but the court expressly instructed the jury to disregard all references to outside parties and to confine their deliberations to the issues between the parties, the fact that the defendant was indemnified being permitted to go before the jury later in the form of evidence without objection, such evidence coming from a witness for defendant, the suggestions of plaintiff's counsel were not prejudicial misconduct justifying reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Ione Imogene De Lierre against Goldberg, Bowen & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment modified, and as modified affirmed, with the order.

H. B. M. Miller, of San Francisco, for appellant. Stidger & Stidger and Wm. F. Herron, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries, and from an order denying a new trial. The cause was tried before a jury.

The first contention of the appellant is directed against the alleged misconduct of counsel for plaintiff during the proceedings for the impanelment of the jury, consisting in asking of a prospective juror of the question, "Do you know a corporation known as the General Accident, Life & Fire Insurance Company?" and in stating in substance in answer to an objection to said question that the defendant was indemnified by said corporation against liability for injuries of the nature of those involved in this action. The question and statement of counsel were assigned as misconduct. The court sustained the objection to the question; and a little later when the same matter was again adverted to by plaintiff's counsel, and again assigned as misconduct, the court expressly admonished the jury to disregard any reference to outside matters, and confine themselves to the issues between the two immediate parties to the case. Still later, and during the cross-examination of one of the defendant's witnesses, counsel for the plaintiff asked him whether he had not been told by defendant to go down and make a report to the surety company in regard to the accident. This question was also objected to and assigned as misconduct, and the court again sustained the objection to it; but counsel for the defendant did not ask nor did the court give any further admonition to the jury.

In urging here the contention that by this repeated reference by counsel for the plaintiff, to the effect that defendant was indemnified against an adverse verdict by a surety company, he was guilty of prejudicial misconduct requiring a reversal of the case, the appellant strongly relies upon the cases of Roche v. Llewellyn, 140 Cal. 563, 74 Pac. 147, and Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 Pac. 700, wherein the Supreme Court has declared it to be the law in this state that during the trial of an action for damages evidence that the defendant has been indemnified against loss by a surety company is not only inadmissible, but that its offer on the part of the plaintiff is prejudicial misconduct.

It is, however, contended by the respondent that the first of the above-quoted cases has reference only to evidence offered during the actual trial, and that its doctrine is not to be extended to questions asked of jurors upon their voir dire examination with a view to ascertaining whether they are connected in any disqualifying relations with an indemnifying company. It is insisted by respondent that such questions are in themselves admissible when asked of a juror, and even necessary in order to insure the plaintiff a body of jurors unbiased by any connection in favor of the real party interested in the defense of the action, and that such an inquiry being admissible it could not be misconduct to pursue it in the examination of jurors; and it is further contended by the respondent that as to the case of Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., supra, the language of the learned justice writing the opinion in that case is to be construed as being limited to cases where the inquiry of the juror is not made in good faith, but where the question is asked, not for the purpose of ascertaining whether the juror is free from bias or interest which may affect his verdict, but merely for the purpose of getting the fact that the defendant is indemnified by a surety company before the jury. In support of these contentions, the respondent cites a number of quite recent cases from other jurisdictions, holding such questions proper when asked in good faith of a juror upon his voir dire examination, and notably the cases of Blair v. McCormack Construction Co., 123 App. Div. 30, 107 N. Y. Supp. 750, and Rinklin v. Acker, 125 App. Div. 244, 109 N. Y. Supp. 125, wherein the rule for which the respondent contends is exhaustively set forth; and earlier cases cited and relied upon by the appellant are criticized.

[1] We do not, however, deem it necessary to determine this disputed question in the instant case, for the reason that the record discloses that, during a later stage of the trial, the fact that the defendant was indemnified by the particular surety company adverted to was permitted to go before the jury in the form of evidence without objection, and that such evidence came from the lips of one of the defendant's own witnesses. This fact, taken with the further fact that the court did in the earlier stages of the case expressly instruct the jury to disregard all references to outside parties and confine their deliberations to the issues between the actual parties before the court, impels us to the conclusion that the question and suggestions of plaintiff's counsel cannot be held to have amounted to such prejudicial misconduct as to justify a reversal of the case. It is further contended by the appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify any verdict in plaintiff's favor, and particularly insufficient to justify a verdict for the sum of $6,000, and that in this latter respect the verdict should be set aside as excessive.

[2] On a careful review of the somewhat voluminous evidence in the case, we are of the opinion that there is a very substantial conflict, upon the questions of the negligence of the defendant's employé, and as to the severity and permanence of plaintiff's injuries, and also as to the plaintiff's contributory negligence; and that therefore these were matters which were properly within the purview of the jury, with whose discretion we will not interfere.

[3, 4] The appellant finally urges that the court committed certain errors of law in overruling the defendant's objection to evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff in support of the averments in her complaint, to the effect that she had been specially damaged in the sum of $254.78 by reason of the fact that in consequence of her injuries she had been unable to keep up her payments upon a lot in Richmond, and as a result had lost the installments already paid, amounting to said sum. The plaintiff pleaded this matter in detail in her complaint as special damages. The defendant, instead of seeking to eliminate this element of alleged damage from the complaint by proper motion, responded with denials which put in issue the matter so pleaded, and the parties went to trial upon the issue thus framed. The specific amount of such damage sought was fixed by these pleadings and by the offered evidence of the plaintiff in support thereof. The respondent, while not conceding that damages of this sort are not recoverable, is willing that the verdict should be reduced in that specific sum. We think these damages were too remote and ought not to be allowed; but we do not think the judgment should be reversed for that reason when, as the record shows, the precise amount of this alleged item of damage was definitely fixed at all times during the trial, and also when the parties were content to tender a direct issue as to the fact and amount of this item of alleged detriment. Under these conditions, we think substantial justice will be done by reducing the verdict and judgment in the sum of $254.78.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be modified by striking therefrom the sum of $254.78, and that otherwise the judgment and order are affirmed, appellant to recover its costs upon this appeal.

There is a fatal variance where an information, under Pen. Code, § 523, charges the sending of a threatening letter in "words and figures following," giving a letter in English, and the proof is of a letter in a foreign language, of which the letter in the information was a translation, instead of alleging that it was in the foreign language, "a correct translation of which was as follows."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Threats, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig.  6.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Jack Rizotto was convicted, denied a new trial, and appeals. Reversed.

Carter & Torchia, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Section 523 of the Penal Code provides that:

"Every person who with intent to extort any money or other property from another, sends or delivers to any person any letter or other writing, whether subscribed or not, expressing or implying, or adapted to imply, any threat such as is specified in section five hundred and nineteen, is punishable in the same manner as if such money or property were actually obtained by means of such threat."

And section 519 of the Penal Code provides that:

"Fear, such as will constitute extortion, may be induced by a threat, either: 1. To do an unlawful injury to the person or property of the individual threatened, or to any relative of his, or member of his family. * * *

By an information filed by the district attorney defendant was charged with the offense defined by said section 523 of the Penal Code, in that, with intent to extort money and property from one Dominick Lauricella, he sent him—

"a certain letter and writing, which said letter and writing did then and there express and imply, and was adapted to imply, a threat to do an unlawful injury to the person and property of the said Dominick Lauricella, which said letter and writing was then and there and is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Long Beach, July 5, 1915.

"Dear Friend: This day I tell you to bring One Thousand Dollars of which you know, at one o'clock you will take the road to Anaheim and look for an electric pole. You will find one with Number L20072 and there will be also the number of your house. Near to the pole you will find a pepper tree with a hole in it, and near to that pepper tree there is a can. Therefore, you will put the money in that can, and you will cover the same. You know very well what will happen to you if you don't do as we tell you and that is enough."

At the trial, after showing that Lauricella had received through the post office a letter written in the Italian language, the people, over defendant's objection, were permitted to introduce such letter in evidence, followed by evidence of a translation thereof which, while widely different in words, in substance was the same as that set out and alleged in the information.

Appellant justly insists there was a fatal variance in the allegations of the information and proof so received in support thereof. "It is said by Wharton that when an indictment undertakes to set forth a document in hæc verba, or according to its 'tenor' or 'as follows' or 'in words and figures following' then any variance as to the words of the document, unless such variance be a mere fault of spelling, is material." People v. Phillips, 70 Cal. 61, 11 Pac. 493. There was nothing whatsoever in the information calculated to acquaint defendant with the fact that the letter which he was charged with sending to Lauricella was written in the Italian language. On the contrary, it was expressly and directly alleged, not only that it was in the English language, but the words and figures thereof were set out therein. Where the information, as here, is in fact based upon an instrument in a foreign language which in the information is alleged to have been "in the words and figures following," followed by an English translation thereof, without disclosing the foreign origin of the document or the fact that the copy set out is a translation thereof, the original is not admissible in evidence as proof of such allegation. Townsend on Slander and Libel, § 330; Sticht v. State, 25 Tex. App. 420, 8 S. W. 477, 8 Am. St. Rep. 444; Wharton's Criminal Evidence (10th Ed.) § 114a. Where the pleader is not content with the statement of the legal effect of such instrument, it is not only the custom, but sufficient, to allege that it is in the foreign language adopted, "a correct translation of which is as follows," setting the same out according to its English meaning. People v. Ah Woo, 28 Cal. 205; Stevens v. Kobayshi, 20 Cal. App. 153, 128 Pac. 419. Otherwise a defendant suffers prejudice, since, as here, before trial he was not informed that he would be called upon to defend himself upon a charge of sending a communication other than in the language with which he is charged. It would be unfair towards a defendant charged with sending a threatening letter in the English language, a copy of which is set out in hæc verba in the information, to establish such fact by proof that it was a translation of Egyptian hieroglyphics or some secret code, without apprising him that the charge was based upon such code characters from which the letter set out purported to be deciphered. The rule invoked is not one of construction of the document so pleaded, but one of identity and description; and, in the absence of appropriate allegations, there is nothing in the information under which the letter received in evidence was admissible. There was a fatal and material variance in the allegation and proof offered in support thereof.

The appeal prosecuted by defendant is from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial, both of which are reversed.

GASKILL v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.
(Civ. 1978.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 27, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 24, 1916.)

1. CARRIERS — NEGLIGENCE — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held insufficient to charge defendant railway company with negligence in the operation of its train, whereby plaintiff was injured in attempting to board it while moving.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1313; Dec. Dig. —318(8).]

2. CARRIERS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — ATTEMPTING TO BOARD MOVING TRAIN.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to board a moving passenger train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1401; Dec. Dig. —346(1).]

3. TRIAL — DIRECTED VERDICT — WHEN AUTHORIZED.

The court is authorized to take a case from the jury by directing a verdict for defendant where upon the whole evidence, were a verdict returned for plaintiff, the court would have felt impelled to set it aside as unsupported by the evidence.

4. NEW TRIAL — GROUNDS — SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT.

An affidavit which merely states that a certain witness did not testify as counsel for plaintiff understood she would testify, and that she had made statements inconsistent with her testimony, does not show ground for granting a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 303-305; Dec. Dig. —147.]

5. NEW TRIAL — GROUNDS — SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT.

An affidavit by counsel for plaintiff that he had discovered evidence which would establish a particular fact, but which did not state what particular evidence would be procured upon that point, was insufficient to justify an order for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 308; Dec. Dig. —150(2).]

6. NEW TRIAL — GROUNDS — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT.

An affidavit in support of a motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence was insufficient, where it did not appear therefrom whether the witness had communicat-

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George D. Murray, Judge.

Action by Leo B. Gaskill, administrator, against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. O. Graves and F. A. Preston, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Frank Karr and A. W. Ashburn, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff as the administrator of the estate of Albert Kolb, deceased, brought this action to recover damages on account of the death of said Kolb, alleged to have been caused by the negligent acts of the defendant corporation. At the conclusion of all of the testimony the trial judge directed a verdict to be returned for the defendant. The judgment, which in effect was that of a nonsuit, was thereupon entered, whereupon subsequently plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was denied. This appeal was then taken from the judgment as entered and from the order denying the motion mentioned. The appeal is presented on a statement of the case.

In September, 1911, defendant as a railway corporation was engaged in operating between the city of Los Angeles and the towns of Santa Monica, Ocean Park, and Venice an electric railroad, which was used mainly for the carriage of passengers. On a day about the date mentioned, Albert Kolb, the deceased, in company with a friend named Peter Dombroska, journeyed to the beach town of Ocean Park, where the two men spent the greater part of the day. At about 12 o'clock at night they appeared at one of the stopping places provided by the railroad company at Ocean Park, where they waited for a train to take them back to the city. The men had been drinking intoxicating liquor during the day and evening. At the point where the stopping place referred to was located there was a double-track railway construction, over which the electric cars passed, and which tracks, proceeding from the north toward the station of Venice to the south, cut at right angles, or approximately thereto, various streets which intersected the right of way and defined the blocks of land upon which numerous buildings were built. At a point about 60 feet below or southerly from the intersection of Pier avenue with the trolley way was located a sign attached to a post, which bore the legend, "All Cars Stop Here." In considering the action of the court in refusing to submit the issues defined by the pleadings to the jury, the testimony of Dombroska, the friend of deceased, may be taken as furnishing the most favorable evidence offered in the attempt to sustain the cause of action alleged. It may be remarked that, as to many of the material matters testified to by this witness, there was contradictory testimony given on behalf of the defendant. Dombroska testified that he and his friend Kolb had gone to the beach for a day of pleasure. He testified that they had patronized the saloons quite liberally, but he stated that neither he nor his friend at 12 o'clock that night was in a state of intoxication. He testified that Kolb drank "one whisky" in the forenoon and two glasses of beer in the afternoon, while he (Dombroska) had two drinks of whisky in the morning and "a dozen or 13 beers" in the afternoon; that they purchased a pint bottle of whisky before they went to the stopping place where they intended to take the cars for Los Angeles. At the time they arrived at this place it was about 12 o'clock. After going to a neighboring lunch counter and partaking of food, they returned to the railway line and waited for a train. A police officer testified later in the case that he had observed the two men when they first came up and that they were intoxicated; that they asked him when the last car would leave for Los Angeles, and he told them at 12:07; that they then inquired where they could get lunch and he pointed out a lunch counter to them, which they entered; that they did not leave the lunch stand until after the last train had gone, and when they came out he told them that their train had gone, and that the train which was approaching was not going to Los Angeles. Dombroska in his testimony said, referring to this conversation with the policeman:

"I don't remember whether he told me that that car was not going to Los Angeles; that the last car had gone to Los Angeles. I have had a conversation with him, but I don't know if I spoke to him about any car, what time she was going to leave."

This statement by Dombroska may be taken as an admission of the truth of what the officer testified to regarding the inquiries made of him by the two men, and of his responses thereto. Dombroska testified that he and Kolb saw a train approaching from the north and consisting of several cars—the fact was shown by other testimony without dispute that it was a four-car train—and that on the front of the train was a sign bearing the words, "Los Angeles"; that the train, as it approached the point marked as the stopping place by the sign on the post, slowed down to 9 or 10 miles an hour; that pursuant to an understanding between him and his friend he attempted to get on the front platform of the first car, while Kolb made a like attempt on the second platform of the same car. Dombroska testified that he got on safely, and observed that the car had increased its speed with a jerk, at which moment he observed his friend Kolb fall. The train continued without stopping until a switch was reached, where Dombroska alighted and returned to the place where Kolb had attempted to board the train; and found that he had been badly injured, his legs having been cut off by the wheels of the car, and from which injuries he later died. The operatives of the train testified that the train was out of service at the time of the accident, on its way to the car barns, and that the only sign displayed was a sign reading, "Take Next Car"; that one of the conductors stood upon the front platform and as the train passed the stopping place at Pier avenue, and motioned toward the sign to the several people who were standing there, and at the same time called out that the train was "out of service." It would seem also from the whole of the testimony, a portion of which only is referred to, that both Kolb and Dombroska were intoxicated.

[1, 2] However, even giving full credit to the strongest testimony introduced by the plaintiff, to wit, that of Dombroska, and leaving out of consideration all testimony which conflicts therewith, we are of the opinion that from that evidence no reasonable deduction can be drawn which tends to establish the charge that the defendant was negligent; and, if we assume that the evidence tends to show a negligent act in the operation of the train, then, without any question in our minds at all, by Dombroska's own statements, the men were guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to board a train of cars moving, as Dombroska said, at the rate of from 9 to 10 miles per hour. It must be taken as a fact, for Dombroska did not deny the statement of the police officer witness that he and Kolb were told by the officer that the last train for Los Angeles and gone, and that the approaching train was not one bound for that city. If the train was one upon which it was intended that passengers should be received at that point, Kolb and Dombroska knew that all they had to do was to wait until it had come safely to a stop before attempting to get aboard. They chose rather to take the risk attending the act of getting aboard the rapidly moving cars, and the resultant injury was one which must be directly attributed to their heedless and negligent conduct.

[3] It has been repeatedly held that the court is authorized to take the case from the jury when, upon the whole evidence, were a verdict returned in favor of a plaintiff, the court would have felt impelled to set it aside as unsupported by the evidence.

The cases are collected and cited in the Matter of the Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 472, 123 Pac. 267.

[4-6] Upon the motion for a new trial three affidavits were offered; the first one referring to the testimony of the witness Jessica Maloney. This person it appears did not testify as counsel for the plaintiff had understood that she would testify, and the affidavit only showed she had made statements inconsistent with her testimony given at the trial. There was nothing in the facts stated in this affidavit which established any good cause for the granting of the motion. The second affidavit was made by counsel in the case, who averred in general terms that he had discovered evidence which would establish the fact that the train at the time of the accident stopped and then jerked and threw Kolb under the cars. There is no statement in this affidavit as to what particular evidence the counsel could procure upon that point. The third affidavit was made by Charlotte Jackson, who deposed that she was at the place of the accident on the night in question, and that she stopped near the sign (which was referred to in Dombroska's testimony); that when the two men started to get aboard, the cars made a short stop and immediately jerked and went on; that the jerk of the car threw the younger man backward, and he was run over by the second car. She further deposed that she did not know that any suit was pending until she read an account of the trial in a Los Angeles newspaper, and that she then communicated her knowledge of the case to the attorney for the plaintiff; that the reason she did not appear and give testimony was that she did not know of the suit and was not summoned in the case. It does not appear whether the affiant communicated her knowledge of the case to the counsel before the close of the trial or afterwards. For aught that appears by her statements, she communicated immediately upon reading of the trial in a newspaper, and we cannot surmise whether the trial was in progress at that time or had ended. No other showing was made on the part of plaintiff or his counsel as to why this witness was not produced at the trial.

[7] The point is made that after the jury was instructed to return a verdict for the defendant, the verdict was so returned; upon a poll being taken of the jurors, six answered, affirming the verdict as returned, and six answered that it was not their verdict. The record shows that the court presented a form of verdict to the jury, and directed the foreman to sign the same without the jury leaving the box, and that the verdict was so returned. The effect of the judgment is that of a nonsuit, which might have been entered without any direction requiring the jury to return any verdict in the case. Such being the result, it would seem immaterial whether the jurors agreed with the court or not, as any view held by them in opposition to that held by the court could not be allowed to prevail.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 336(4) — PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — CONTRACTS — "LOWEST RESPONSIBLE BIDDER" — CHARACTER OF MATERIALS.

Under Oakland City Charter, §§ 126, 130, requiring the city council to award a contract to the lowest bidder, except as otherwise provided in the charter, allowing rejection of any and all bids, and requiring rejection of bid of any party who has been delinquent or unfaithful in a former contract with the city, and all bids other than the lowest regular bid, and providing for public work, when costing over $500, to be done by contract, let to "lowest responsible bidder," the term "lowest responsible bidder" does not mean in every case the lowest bidder who has not been delinquent or unfaithful in a former contract with the city; but where the character of work or materials required calls for the exercise of sound discretion by city officials in determining the lowest bidder whose offer best responds to the requirements of the work, the council may use such discretion and award the bid to such bidder.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 336(4) — IMPROVEMENTS — CONTRACTS — AWARD TO LOWEST BIDDER — EFFECT OF AWARD.

The honest exercise of discretion of a city council, in considering the adaptability to the use required of goods offered, in determining who is the lowest responsible bidder under a charter calling for award of public works contract to such bidder, is not reviewable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Donahue, Judge.

Suit by M. G. West against the City of Oakland and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. H. Cross, of San Francisco (Arthur H. Brandt, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. T. C. Van Ness, Jr., of San Francisco, for respondent Pauly Jail Building Co. Paul C. Morf and John J. Earle, both of Oakland, for other respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants and from an order denying a new trial. The facts of the case are these:

The city of Oakland, being about to construct a jail in the upper stories of its city hall, advertised for bids for furnishing and installing said jail. It is conceded that in all respects the legal steps leading up to the award of the contract for such jail construction were duly and regularly taken. In the call for bids the council directed the attention of prospective bidders to the plans and specifications of the proposed work, and required that all bids should be prepared and submitted in accordance therewith. A very material element in the mechanical construction of a modern jail is the locking device, and with reference to this portion of the furnishings to be bid upon the plans and specifications provided that:

"The locking device should be simple in construction and operation and entirely free from complicated parts liable to unusual wear. The device shall have positive lever action, shall have indexes indicating the number of each cell so that the operator can set with the lever each door or the entire bank of cells, which shall then with a single movement of the main operating levers open or close any one door or all."

With respect to locking devices for jails the record sufficiently shows that there are several kinds, or rather designs, of these devices differing in mechanical construction, and either patented or controlled by different companies, who are competitors for the installation each of its own particular form or design of locking device. There were four competitors who responded to the defendant's call for bids—the M. G. West Company, the Pauly Jail Building Company, the Waterhouse & Price Company, and the Ralston Iron Works, Incorporated. The M. G. West Company submitted with its bid a design of locking device known as the Stewart locking device, which it offered to install in connection with the rest of the work bid upon for the sum of $24,528.50. The Pauly Jail Building Company submitted its own pattern of locking device with its bid for the entire work in the sum of $30,127. The other two bidders were still higher in their bids by several thousand dollars.

When the bids were opened, the officials of the city council held several sessions for the purpose of investigating the merits of the several locking devices presented, and even sent experts in jail construction to the city of Sacramento, and also to the city of Portland, Or., where the M. G. West Company had installed the Stewart design of locking device, identical with that which it was proposed by said company to install in Oakland under its bid; but the city council, after quite a careful and exhaustive investigation, found that the Stewart locking device was unsatisfactory in both design and operation, and that it did not meet in these respects the requirements of the plans and specifications, while, on the other hand, the locking device of the Pauly Jail Building Company did measure up to those requirements. The city council therefore rejected the bid of the M. G. West Company, although it was the lowest in price, and accepted the higher bid of the Pauly Jail Building Company, whereupon this plaintiff, as a citizen and taxpayer of the city of Oakland, instituted this proceeding to have set aside and canceled the award of the contract for the work to the Pauly Jail Building Company and the contract made in accordance therewith, and to enjoin the other officials of the city from the payment of any money due or to become due in the course of its execution.

The court rendered its judgment upon the trial of the cause in favor of the defendants, and denied a motion for a new trial, whereupon the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

It was not averred by the plaintiff in his pleadings, nor sought to be proven upon the trial of the cause, that the city council of Oakland, or any of the members thereof, acted fraudulently or corruptly in making the award of the work in question to another than the lowest bidder for such work; but the appellant relies for his success upon this appeal upon his construction of certain provisions of the city charter of Oakland with respect to the award of contracts after competitive bidding for public work. The sections of the city charter thus relied upon by the appellant are sections 126 and 130 thereof. Section 126 is entitled "Requirements for Bids," and after providing with much of detail for the form and method of bidding, and for the opening and examination of bids, goes on to declare that the city council "shall award the contract to the lowest bidder except as otherwise in this charter provided." It also provides that:

"The council or board, as the case may be, may reject any and all bids, and must reject the bid of any party who has been delinquent or unfaithful in any former contract with the city, and all bids other than the lowest regular bid."

Section 130 of the charter is entitled "Public Work to be Done by Contract," and provides in part as follows:

"In the erection, improvement and repair of all public buildings and works, in all streets and sewer work, and in all work in and about streams, bays or water-fronts, or in or about embankments or other works for protection against overflow or erosion, and in furnishing any supplies and material for the same, or for any other use, by the city, or in the purchasing of any supplies to be used by the city, when the expenditure required for the same exceeds the sum of $500, it shall be done by contract, and shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder after advertising for five consecutive days in the official newspaper for sealed proposals for the work contemplated or supplies to be furnished."

[1] It is the contention of the appellant that these two sections of the city charter of Oakland are to be read and construed together, and that, when so construed, the term "lowest responsible bidder," as used in the body of section 130 thereof, and which has reference specially to the construction and equipment of public buildings, is to be held to mean only that the lowest responsible bidder shall be the lowest bidder who has not been delinquent or unfaithful in any former contract with the city, and that otherwise, in every case of contracts awarded by competitive bidding, the council must either award the contract to the lowest bidder or must reject all bids.

[2, 3] We are of the opinion, however, that this is altogether too narrow and binding a construction to place upon these provisions of the Oakland city charter. There are many occasions in the experiences of municipal government when the quality of the thing to be supplied in the course of the public service depends upon conditions which differentiate bidders, and require the exercise of a sound discretion on the part of city officials in determining whether the wares or device which each individual bidder offers in the form of his own exclusive design are such as will meet the particular requirements of the intended work. In order to cover such cases it is quite usual in the provisions of city charters to find such terms as "lowest and best bidder," or as "lowest responsible bidder," and the like; and these phrases have been given by the courts a particular meaning, in which it must be presumed they are used by the framers of city charters, in the absence of other limiting clauses. The term "lowest responsible bidder" has been held to mean the lowest bidder whose offer best responds in quality, fitness, and capacity to the particular requirements of the proposed work, and that where, by the use of these terms, the council has been invested with discretionary power as to which is the lowest responsible bidder, having regard to the quality and adaptability of the material or article to the particular requirements of its use, such discretion will not be interfered with by the courts, in the absence of direct averments and proof of fraud. 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 811, p. 1223, and cases cited. And even when in statutes and charters the term "lowest bidder" only is employed, the courts have held that, in determining whether a bid is the lowest among several others, there may be cases where the quality and ability of the thing offered—in other words, its adaptability to the purpose for which it is required—may be considered. Clapton v. Taylor, 49 Mo. App. 117; Cleveland Fire Alarm Co. v. Metropolitan Fire Com'rs, 55 Barb. (N. Y.) 288. In fact, it is conceded by counsel for the appellant that if, under a fair and liberal construction of this charter, the city council had discretion, in awarding the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, to consider the quality of the respective devices upon which the several bids were predicated, such discretion, honestly exercised, will not be interfered with. We think it evident that the city charter of Oakland is to be given such a construction, and that this is a very appropriate case for the application of the principles above set forth in determining which was the lowest responsible bidder for the furnishing of devices and material to be used in outfitting the city jail, and that in the exercise of its discretion in determining this issue the city council is not only shown not to have acted corruptly, but, on the contrary, is shown to have arrived at its conclusions with quite commendable circumspection and care.

[4] It is, however, insisted by the appellant that since the plans and specifications did not call for nor require the submission of models of locking devices, nor provide for comparison of the merits of the respective devices of the several bidders, the council had no authority to make such investigation, nor to determine as to which bidder otherwise financially responsible was presenting the most suitable and practical device. A sufficient answer to this contention is that apparently the M. G. West Company, far from objecting to these comparisons and investigations, cooperated with the city council in making them, to the extent of exhibiting before that body a working model of its particular locking device, and of suggesting the names of cities where the experts of the city council might observe jails wherein the Stewart locking device of the precise pattern it proposed under its bid to install might be observed in actual operation. The M. G. West Company having thus submitted to the method adopted by the city council for determining the issue before it, the appellant cannot here be held to complain that the action of that body was in that respect beyond its power.

[5] It is also contended by appellant that it was the duty of the city council, upon determining that the M. G. West Company was not the lowest responsible bidder, to make a specific finding to that effect. Whatever the rule upon that subject may be in other jurisdictions, the question has been determined in this state adversely to the appellant's contention in the case of Rice v. Board of Trustees, 107 Cal. 398, 40 Pac. 551, wherein it was discussed and decided that it was not necessary for a municipal board, in making a record of its action in the rejection of certain bids, to also make an entry of its reason for so doing, but that the real reason for its action might be shown upon the trial of the case involving the validity and integrity of the action of the board.

Judgment and order affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨994(2)—REVIEW—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

The acceptance by the jury of the truth of the testimony of one witness, rather than that of another, cannot be interfered with by the reviewing court, unless it can be safely said their conclusion was the result of passion and prejudice controlling their minds.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨150(4)—INJURY—NEGLIGENCE.

For the city engineer in charge of construction of a sewer to send a laborer to work at a point in the trench concededly dangerous, because of removal of the cribbing and existence of a crack, and without specially warning him, was culpable negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Estella Porterfield and another against the City of Modesto. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux and E. R. Jones, both of Modesto, for appellant. J. W. Hawkins, of Modesto, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action brought by plaintiffs, Estella and Agnes Porterfield, to recover damages for the death of Charles Porterfield, the husband and father, respectively, of plaintiffs. Porterfield's death resulted from injuries received while working as a laborer in a sewer trench being constructed by the city of Modesto.

The councilmen of the city were made parties defendant, but, by consent of plaintiffs' counsel, the court instructed the jury that if they found for the plaintiffs, the verdict should be against the city of Modesto only. The case was tried by the superior court with a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $7,500. Based upon the verdict, a judgment was entered for said sum in favor of plaintiffs, from which defendant has appealed under the alternative method.

The record is singularly free from any claim of errors of the court in conducting the trial. The instructions were clear, and succinct statements of the law necessary for the guidance of the jury and are in no wise challenged. The nature and extent of the grounds for the appeal will be found in the following statement in defendant's brief:

"The theory of the defense at the trial of said action and on this appeal is that the injuries received by said Charles Porterfield, and which resulted in his death, were received not in the line of his duty, but were caused by his gross carelessness in disobeying the orders of his superior, G. H. Freitas (city engineer in charge of the work), and also that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, for the reason that there was an utter failure on the part of the plaintiffs to establish the negligence alleged in the complaint."

In short, the defense was contributory negligence by the deceased. It was alleged in the complaint that the said construction work was in charge of said engineer, Freitas, pursuant to the resolution of defendant; that, on October 9, 1913, a portion of the excavation, or trench, for the sewer pipe had been opened up for some distance, and the sewer pipe laid therein and the trench ordered by the city to be closed; that the soil through which the trench was dug was of such nature that to prevent its caving and falling upon laborers working in the trench it was necessary that the sides of the trench should be secured by cribbing, in the absence of which it was a dangerous and unsafe place to work, a fact well known to defendants; that, notwithstanding such fact and such knowledge by defendants, Porterfield was ordered by defendants to go into the trench and shovel dirt around a manhole being therein constructed; that the bracings or cribbing at the place where Porterfield was directed to work had previously been removed, thus leaving the walls of the trench without support and liable to cave in and fall upon him when he was at work; that it was unnecessary to send him into the trench for the purpose above stated, for the reason that, as had elsewhere been done in filling the trench, earth which had been thrown out of the trench and lying along the sides at the top could have been used for the purpose of filling around the manhole; "that while the said Charles Porterfield was carrying out the instructions of the defendants, and was in said trench for the purpose of shoveling said dirt around said manhole, the said bank of said ditch caved in and upon the said Charles Porterfield and crushed his head, and the said Charles Porterfield did, on the 10th day of October, 1913, die as a result of said injury"; that defendant did not provide said Porterfield a reasonably safe place in which to work, "in that said defendant did not keep said ditch cribbed and braced. That said defendant sent said Charles Porterfield into a place unsafe to work in, with full knowledge of the dangerous condition of said place." With much amplification the complaint sets forth the facts of which the foregoing is a brief summary.

The testimony was that the trench had been closed up to a point near to and east of the manhole, and had also been filled west of the manhole within about 6 or 7 feet of the top. The manhole was in course of construction, and was completed to a point a few feet from the top. The following description of the manner in which the work was done is taken from respondents' brief and is in accordance with the testimony:

"According to the testimony of all the witnesses, the soil in the city of Modesto where the sewer was being constructed had on top a strata of hard material, and underlying this was loose running sand. The cave-in was on F street, between Fifth and Sixth streets. As the excavation was opened up, cribbing was placed in the excavation to keep the ground from caving in. The first row of cribbing extended down 10 feet, and was composed of upright boards placed on both sides of the excavation and held apart by jacks. The second row of cribbing extended down the rest of the distance, and was constructed for the same purpose and in the same manner as the first row of cribbing. Always, prior to the death of Porterfield, it was customary for the excavation to be filled before removing the cribbing. The filling in was done in the following manner: Dirt was filled in until it reached the first row of jacks, then the lowest row of jacks was removed, and dirt filled up to second row of jacks, which were then taken out and the filling in progressed as before until the excavation had been filled up to the top of the lower row or cribbing. Then the lower row of cribbing was pulled out by means of chains and jackscrews, the upper row of cribbing still remaining in place. The lower row of jacks on the upper row of cribbing was then removed, and the filling progressed as before, each row of jacks being removed as the dirt in the excavation was filled until the whole excavation was filled. Thereupon the upper row of cribbing was removed by pulling out the upright boards with chain and jack.

"When Porterfield was killed the cribbing had all been removed but the excavation had not been filled up, and the workmen had placed cribbing at one point only in the excavation, and that was right at the manhole, the excavation being cribbed for the distance of 6 feet directly opposite the place where the manhole was being constructed. The banks of the excavation west of the manhole had cracked, but had not fallen into the excavation. The engineer in charge of the work knew of this fact. Always, prior to the time Porterfield was killed, the excavation had been filled from the top, and at the time Porterfield was killed there was plenty of dirt on top of the ground and adjacent to the excavation to fill up the excavation. This dirt was the same dirt that had come from the excavation. Engineer Freitas was in charge of the work for the city of Modesto. The sewer pipe had been laid in the trench, and a manhole was being constructed. The manhole was being constructed with brick and was circular in form. As the masons laid the brick it was necessary to fill in dirt around the manhole to give the masons a place to stand on."

The following statement of respondents' counsel presents the only controverted question of importance in the case:

"Some jacks and timbers had been left in the excavation around and near the manhole, and Engineer Freitas told Porterfield to go down into the trench and throw out the jacks and timbers and fill in around the manhole for the purpose of giving the masons a footing on which to work. Porterfield went down into the trench on the west side of the manhole to carry out the orders given him, and the cracked bank of the excavation fell in upon Porterfield and killed him."

There is no substantial conflict in the evidence, except as to the instructions given to Porterfield, in obedience to which he went into the trench, and upon this point the only direct testimony was given by witness G. W. Bowman, a laborer at work at the manhole, and the testimony of George H. Freitas, the engineer in charge. Bowman testified:

"That he was working at the manhole mentioned in the evidence, and was asked if he heard Engineer Freitas say anything to Porterfield the afternoon the latter was hurt. 'A. Well, he told him to go down in the ditch and clean up and fill in around the manhole. Q. Do you know whether he went down into the ditch or not? A. Yes, sir; he went down. Q. What did he do when he went down there, if you know? A. Well, he taken some jacks and timbers—2x6s and 2x8s out and put them up on the bank. Q. They were lying loose on the ground in there? A. Yes, sir. They had taken out from around the manhole and throwed them back, and he put them on the bank. Q. He put them upon the bank? A. Yes. Q. Now what happened? A. Well, I don't know just how long he had been in there, but it hadn't been but a short time until he got caught—got crushed. He hadn't been very long, however. Q. How did he get crushed? A. Well, he was—it seems as though he was standing leaning up against the north bank, and a chunk of dirt came from the south and caught him. Q. Anyway, he was pinned against the north bank? A. Yes. Q. By a chunk of dirt? A. Yes, sir. Q. How big a chunk was that? A. Oh, I don't know; I guess it would weigh 1,800 or 2,000 or something like that. Q. You were there and saw him pinned? A. No; I didn't see him. I seen him a few seconds afterward. I was up at the mortar box, a little ways. I don't know—15 or 20 feet. Q. What did you do? A. Well, Mr. Freitas and I and Mr. Mueller—Phil Mueller—went down in there and tried to move it and could not do it, and I taken a pick and broke the top of it off, and we pulled him out and laid him out on the bank. * * * Q. Now, had you seen the ground there prior to this time, before he got hurt? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was the condition of it before? A. Well, after the sand tumbled from under it, you know, there was a great long slide of it cracked away back and came out to a peak up here, you know, where that chunk broke off. You see after we taken the timbers out, it cracked out aways from the edge of the ditch, you know; just had been hanging there, I don't know, a couple of weeks or maybe something like that."

He testified that any one going along this ditch could see this crack, and that Mr. Freitas was up and down along the ditch frequently every day. He testified, and other witnesses testified to the fact, that the top earth for a few feet down was compact, but below the formation was almost pure sand, and had to be cribbed to hold it in place; that the sewer was about 16 or 17 feet deep, and had been filled up at the manhole within 6 or 8 feet of the top; that there was dirt a few feet from the edge of the ditch which had been thrown out in digging it. It appeared that about 25 or 30 feet west of the manhole the trench had been filled up within 3 or 3½ feet of the top. On cross-examination the witness testified that Porterfield went into the ditch at this point. It further appeared that the earth, in filling at this point, assumed a slope down towards the manhole to a point 10 or 12 feet from the manhole. The witness testified:

"That it was after he had seen Porterfield go into the ditch that he saw him throwing out jacks and timbers. * * * He went in there where it was shallow, and went down in there where it was deeper, you see, toward the manhole to clean up. Q. Yes; you say Mr. Freitas told him to do that? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you hear Mr. Freitas say it? A. Yes. * * * Q. Well, had he taken out all the timbers and jackscrews? A. Yes. He had taken them all out and commenced to shovel the dirt down."

He testified:

"When I got there, you see, to help to get him out, a chunk of dirt had caught him, and he was standing right against the north wall, and the chunk came from the south. * * * His shovel was sitting there when the chunk of dirt caught him, sitting up by his side like."

On further cross-examination he testified, in answer to a question whether he saw Porterfield in the ditch:

"No, I didn't see him in the ditch; only when I was carrying mortar up—you see I carried mortar from the box up to the manhole and dumped it, and I just got dumped out a painful and came back and seen him in there. Q. I say, you did not see Porterfield in the ditch before he was injured? A. Yes. Q. You say you did see him in the ditch? A. Yes."

After the accident Porterfield was found in an upright position with his back against the north wall of the trench, and 10 or 11 feet from the manhole. The "chunk" of earth mentioned by the witness came from the south side, where the crack was.

Engineer Freitas testified:

That he had full charge of the work on the sewer, and that Porterfield was working with pick and shovel under his direction; that, in the afternoon, about 4:30 o'clock, he directed Porterfield to assist in hauling some brick to the manhole referred to in the testimony. "Q. Just state what you told him to do. A. Well, I told Mr. Porterfield that when he got through that brickwork, hauling the brick, that he was to assist the men around the manhole by back-filling or shoveling dirt back against the manhole. Q. Where did you intend or tell him to stand in doing the work, in the ditch or on the ditch? A. I directed that he should stand in the ditch. * * * Q. What did you tell him? A. I told Mr. Porterfield to fill in from a point where the trench was shallowest, and indicated the point where I wanted him to work. Q. Where did you indicate to him? A. I indicated a point down along about between where it is 3½ feet deep and 3 feet deep in the diagram (indicating)."

He testified:

That the sewer at that point was 16 feet deep, but it had been partly filled, and was between 3 and 3½ feet at the point indicated, and sloped down to the manhole where it was about 8 feet deep; that he sent Porterfield into the ditch to fill out the time until 5 o'clock, quitting time; that the ditch was 44 inches wide; that the distance from the point where he testified he directed Porterfield to stand to the center of the manhole was 27½ feet; that the crack in the earth, mentioned by witnesses, commenced about where Porterfield was to stand (a photograph was introduced showing the surface and the ditch in that vicinity). "The back filling was generally done from the top. That was the regular way of doing. Q. What was the object of having it done from this trench on this special occasion? A. Why, at that time the men were working around the manhole, the brickmen and their assistants, and it wasn't possible to throw the dirt from the top over the top of these men; it would interfere with their work. Q. Well, I believe you said it was done for the purpose of filling in a few moments of extra time. A. That is all, just had the time to fill in from that until 5 o'clock, just simply to keep him busy." He also stated that another reason was to avoid making a dust to the annoyance of the brickmasons. * * * "Q. Do you know whether or not the deceased, Charles Porterfield, went to work at the point? A. I do not. Q. Did you see him in the trench at all? A. Not until after the accident happened, and I helped to take him out."

He testified:

That Porterfield was found at a point about 16 feet from where witness directed him to go to work; that he saw no shovel where Porterfield was found; that there was no necessity for his going there in the line of his duty. "Q. What did you say to Charles Porterfield, if anything, about going into dangerous places? A. Well, I don't know that I ever spoke to him directly. I spoke to the men generally—gave them instructions to always be careful and to be sure wherever they were working that everything was safe and secure."

He was asked if Porterfield was present when he gave such instructions and answered, "I believe he was." He testified that at the point where Porterfield was hurt the cribbing had been removed, and that there had been cribbing there and nothing remained to be done but to fill the ditch except the work at the manhole. A photograph was introduced representing a man standing in the trench where the witness testified Porterfield was killed, which, he testified, was 11 feet from the manhole. Several photographs were introduced to assist the jury in understanding the testimony, but we do not think it necessary to incorporate them in this opinion. On cross-examination the witness was again asked what he said to Porterfield, and answered as before:

"I told him I wanted the dirt filled from the point—the shallowest point—low point where the back fill had been made to within 3½ to 3 feet of the top of the ground. Q. Well, did you say all that? A. I don't know that I did. I told him there is the point that I wanted the dirt from. Q. Did you go over opposite or standing where you were? A. Standing where I was standing. * * * Q. All right. Did you say anything more? A. I did not. * * * I was right at the manhole at the time, where they were building the manhole. The top is about 26 inches in diameter and 8 feet down, about 3 feet. * * * The brick was done to about 8 feet of the bottom."

He testified:

That the conditions were such as to justify him in taking out the cribbing "except right around the manhole. Q. Well, there was a big crack there that came after taking it out, wasn't there? A. That occurred after the cribbing was removed. Q. Yes. You saw that crack before the accident happened, didn't you? A. I did. I knew it was there. * * * Q. Now, if you had left the cribbing in there, you could have filled in around the manhole just the same, couldn't you? A. I could have; yes."

Referring to Porterfield when found, he was asked:

"And in what position was he? A. He was standing. Q. He was standing up? A. Yes. Q. And the lump of dirt had apparently just tipped over like that and caught him? A. Yes."

He testified:

That there had been other "cave-ins" during the construction of the work prior to this time. * * * "Q. When you placed Mr. Porterfield at the point where you say you told him to go, did you tell him that to go down further would be dangerous? A. I don't think I did."

He testified that after the ditch had been partly filled there was danger of its breaking back. He also testified that:

When the men were opening the trench at first "they generally throw it pretty well back off the street, and generally get it back to the curb line, which would be about 25 feet from the center line of the street."

[1] Appellant's contention is that the verdict of the jury must necessarily have been formed upon the testimony of these two witnesses.

"We contend," says the brief, "that when the jurors rejected the direct and positive testimony of Mr. G. H. Freitas, and brought in a verdict based upon the testimony of Bowman, they were acting under passion and prejudice, and were carried away by sympathy for the young widow and her child."

And we are admonished to read carefully the testimony, with the assurance that:

"It must be evident from the answers given by Bowman, especially on his cross-examination, that he was trying to build up a case for the plaintiffs."

We have endeavored to comply with this admonition. It is true that Bowman's testimony at the trial did not harmonize in all respects with his testimony at the coroner's inquest; also that he testified at the trial to some important facts not brought out at the inquest. Experience shows that these features are not unusual. In preliminary inquiries, especially in coroner's inquests involving no element of crime, it is seldom found necessary to enter into a minute examination of all the facts. At any rate, the duty of sifting out the truth and determining the credence to be given to testimony given by witnesses is so peculiarly the function of the jury that the reviewing court cannot interfere with their conclusion unless, as is claimed here, it can safely be said that such conclusion was the result of passion and prejudice controlling the minds of the jurors. We do not feel warranted in holding that the verdict was reached under any such influence.

There was evidence justifying the jury in finding that Porterfield was directed by the engineer in charge to work at a place in the trench admittedly known by the engineer to be dangerous. That it was dangerous appeared from the fact that shortly after he had commenced work Porterfield was killed, and was killed by the caving in of a block of earth which had, for some days, given evidence of its liability to fall into the trench. Whether Porterfield knew of the danger, or to what extent he appreciated it, we do not know. As the cracking of the earth at the point where he was killed was known to Bowman, his fellow laborer at the manhole, it is fair to assume that Porterfield had observed it, but we cannot assume, when told to go into the trench by one who had the authority to direct the work, that he appreciated the danger, and recklessly exposed himself to the consequences and the risks attendant upon the performance of the orders given him. Indeed, we do not understand appellant to claim this. Its claim is that he was told to work at a point in the trench where in fact there was no danger, and that he voluntarily and needlessly assumed a position of peril, and hence plaintiff cannot recover. But appellant overlooks, or entirely rejects, the testimony that deceased was told to go to work at the very point where he was killed.

If we could unhesitatingly accept appellant's view of the evidence, we might accept its construction of the Employers' Liability Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 796), namely, that while the statute has abolished the doctrine of assumption of risk, and—

"while the employer must furnish his employés with safety appliances and safe places to work, that, nevertheless, the moment the employé, without so being required by his duties and not acting under orders of his employer, leaves that safe place and goes off on private excursions of his own to other parts of the work, he becomes nothing more than a trespasser so far as any liability for injuries received by him is concerned. We do not understand it to have been the intention of the lawmakers, in abolishing assumption of risk, to have intended to make the employer liable regardless of how or when the employé is injured."

[2] This may be a reasonable view of the statute where the facts furnish a proper basis for it. The trouble with accepting it in the present case is that it rests upon an assumed state of facts which the jury, within their powers, manifestly rejected. Upon the facts which the jury were authorized to accept it seems to us that there was culpable negligence in sending the deceased to work in a place concededly dangerous, and especially was it negligence to do so without specifically warning deceased of the danger. The only warning given deceased was of a general nature, at other times, if any was given, or one other occasion, as appeared, when the men were taking out some cribbing. Freitas was better able to judge of the danger than was deceased, and the latter might well have assumed the work he was told to do was not imminently dangerous or his superior would not have directed him to go there. The law governing such a situation is too well known to call for citation of authorities.

The learned trial judge gave instructions upon the subject, to which no objection is now made, quite as favorable to defendant as the case would admit of, and it seems to us, in taking them as their guide, the jury were supported in their verdict by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA CENTRAL CREAMERIES CO. v. CRESCENT CITY LIGHT, WATER & POWER CO. (Civ. 1438.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 2, 1916. On Rehearing, July 1, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 31, 1916.)

1. JUDGMENT — 485 — VOID ON FACE.

To hold a judgment void on its face the fact must appear from an inspection of the judgment roll.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 919; Dec. Dig. — 485.]

2. JUDGMENT — 279 — JUDGMENT ROLL — DIRECTION AS TO FINDINGS.

Direction of court to counsel to prepare findings is not part of the judgment roll; Code Civ. Proc. § 670, enumerating other papers as constituting it.

3. JUDGMENT — 24 — VOID ON FACE.

No matter what errors in practice or procedure may have occurred, the judgment is not void, where on the face of the judgment roll appears a judgment of a competent court, and such as by law it was authorized to make, on a subject-matter within its jurisdiction against a party properly before it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. — 24.]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR — 931(1) — RECORD — SHOWING ERROR.

The record does not, as is necessary, affirmatively show error; it appearing only that findings prepared by plaintiff at the direction of the court were signed by it, contrary to Code Civ. Proc. § 634, before expiration of five days after service on defendant, as in support of regularity of the court's action it will be presumed defendant waived the service or the five day's time to examine them, or was present and made no objection to the signing.

5. TRIAL — 405(1) — FINDINGS — TIME OF SIGNING — WAIVER.

The provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 634, that where the court directs a party to prepare findings a copy of the proposed findings shall be served on all parties five days before findings shall be signed by it, and it shall not sign any findings before expiration of such five days, being solely for the benefit of the party, and not for public reason, may by provision of Civ.

Code, § 3513, be waived by him, giving the court jurisdiction to sign the findings before expiration of the five days.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; John L. Childs, Judge.

Action by the California Central Creameries Company against the Crescent City, Light, Water & Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. A. Cutler, of San Francisco, and Robt. W. Miller, of Crescent City, for appellant. Gavin McNab, of San Francisco, Hersch & McNulty, of Crescent City, and George W. Mordecai and Oliver B. Wyman, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. It appears from the record in this case that the court, on the 16th day of June, 1915, directed the attorneys for the plaintiff to prepare findings of facts, conclusions of law, and judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant; that counsel for plaintiff did prepare such findings and judgment and they were signed by the trial judge on said 16th day of June, 1915, and filed. Counsel for appellant invokes the provisions of section 634 of the Code of Civil Procedure and claims that because said findings were not served upon him at least five days before being signed the judgment is void. The part of said section relied upon by counsel is worded as follows:

"In all cases where the court directs a party to prepare findings, a copy of said proposed findings shall be served upon all the parties to the action at least five days before findings shall be signed by the court, and the court shall not sign any findings therein prior to the expiration of such five days."

[1-3] 1. The judgment is not void. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and of the defendant. The judgment rendered was one within the jurisdiction of the court. A judgment is only void when, upon an inspection of the judgment roll, it appears that the court either did not have or has exceeded its jurisdiction.

"Whether a judgment is void upon its face can only be determined by an inspection of the judgment roll." People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414; Jacks v. Baldez, 97 Cal. 91, 31 Pac. 899.

"The question is to be determined by an inspection of the record only. Butler v. Soule, 124 Cal. 72 [56 Pac. 601]. * * * Unless the record of the judgment itself affirmatively shows that the court was without jurisdiction to render the judgment, it is not void on its face." Canadian, etc., Co. v. Clarita, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 Pac. 301.

A judgment prematurely rendered is not void. Thus, a judgment rendered and entered against a defendant by default before the time allowed to him by law to answer is not void, but only erroneous. In re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 Pac. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146.

The direction of the court that plaintiff's attorney prepare findings and judgment is no part of the judgment roll (section 670, Code Civ. Proc.), and hence an inspection of it would not disclose that such direction was given. Upon the face of the judgment roll there appears a judgment of a competent court upon a subject-matter within its jurisdiction, against a party properly before it, and such a judgment as it was by law authorized to make. No matter what errors in practice or procedure may have occurred, such a judgment will not be held to be void, and is not.

[4] 2. Does the record affirmatively show error for which the judgment ought to be reversed? There is in the record what purports to be a "Statement on Appeal," and from it we learn that the court directed the attorneys for plaintiff to prepare findings and that they did so, and that they were signed and filed before the expiration of five days after service upon counsel for the defendant.

"It is presumed that the proceedings in the court below were regular, and where error is claimed, it is incumbent upon appellant to show it affirmatively." Perry v. Noonan Furniture Co., 8 Cal. App. 35, 95 Pac. 1128.

"When a judgment of a trial court is brought here for review, it is incumbent upon the appellant affirmatively to show some reversible error committed by that court. If the appeal is presented upon the judgment roll, the error must appear upon the face of the record. Not only will error never be presumed, but every presumption will be indulged in favor of upholding the judgment." Bliss v. Sneath, 119 Cal. 526, 51 Pac. 848.

"In the absence of an affirmative showing that findings were not waived, in support of the order, it will be presumed that they were waived. Mulcahy v. Glazier, 51 Cal. 626; Tomlinson v. Ayers, 117 Cal. 570 [49 Pac. 717]. It is not sufficient to merely specify the absence of findings as an error of law, * * * but, in the absence of findings, that findings were not waived, like any other error relied on for a reversal, must be made to appear in the body of the bill of exceptions or in some other appropriate way." Baker v. Baker, 133 Cal. 626, 73 Pac. 469.

Under the rule of law established in this state, in support of the regularity of the action of the trial court, nothing appearing to the contrary, it will be presumed that appellant waived the service upon him of the proposed findings or waived the five days' time allowed him to examine them, or that he was present when they were presented to the judge for signature and made no objection but acquiesced in their being then signed. The record does not negative his consent or waiver, and it is not apparent that error was committed in signing the findings on the day they were signed.

[5] 3. It is finally claimed that a waiver of the five days' time in which to examine the proposed findings could not give the court jurisdiction to sign them before the expiration of that time.

The amendment to section 634 of the Code of Civil Procedure relied upon was passed solely in the interest of parties litigant to give them an opportunity to suggest to the trial judge, before signing findings, certain matters they desired to have incorporated therein in their own interests. The amendment was not enacted for any public reason; and that the provisions of such a law could be waived by a party litigant seems clear. Section 3513 of the Civil Code provides:

"Any one may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his benefit. But a law established for a public reason cannot be contravened by a private agreement."

The distinction in the application of the first and second clauses of the section is well illustrated by the reasoning in the case of Grannis v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 245, 79 Pac. 891, 106 Am. St. Rep. 23. In that case it was sought to uphold a final decree of divorce entered before one year had expired after the trial and decision of the case. It was held that the public were interested in divorce cases; that the prohibition against granting a divorce until one year had expired was enacted in the interests of the public; that parties to such action have not the right to control procedure as in other actions; the state is "interested in the matter." "The rule in actions affecting property that the parties interested may control the disposition of the interest involved, and that the judgment of the court will be made to conform to such dispositions, when ascertained, has no application to divorce cases. Hence it follows that in such cases there can be no effectual waiving by the parties of any restriction established by law for the benefit of the public or for the protection of the interest which the state has in the preservation and permanence of the marriage relation."

Our conclusion is that the judgment is not void, and that the record does not affirmatively show error.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Rehearing.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. In the petition for a rehearing filed herein it is stated:

"The opinion herein is in error in stating that the appeal is prosecuted from the judgment roll alone."

We have reread the opinion carefully and fail to find any statement or any reasoning that would suggest that we claimed or assumed, in considering or deciding the case, that the record on appeal consisted only of the judgment roll. On the contrary, the opinion expressly referred to the "statement on appeal" and discussed the force and effect of certain statements of facts therein contained. The court, in considering the case, at all times had it clearly in mind that it was an appeal from a judgment supported by a "statement on appeal," which was deemed for all purposes a bill of exceptions, and that the record contained the full judgment roll properly certified to, as was also the "statement on appeal," and had no other thought.

Counsel for the appellant, in his brief filed before the cause was submitted, did not raise the point that the judgment was erroneous, but only contended it was void. In considering the claim made that the judgment was void, we first considered the question of whether an inspection of the judgment roll alone would disclose that it was void, and held that it did not. It was stated in that connection that the order directing the attorneys for plaintiff to prepare findings is not made by law a part of the judgment roll, and an inspection of it would not disclose that any such order had ever been made, and said:

"Upon the face of the judgment roll there appears a judgment of a competent court upon a subject-matter, within its jurisdiction, against a party properly before it and such a judgment as it was by law authorized to make. No matter what errors in practice or procedure occurred such a judgment will not be held to be void."

We still adhere to the above statement and conclusion. See, in addition to the authorities referred to in the opinion, People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651; Butler v. Soule, 124 Cal. 69, 56 Pac. 601; Jacks v. Baldez, 97 Cal. 91, 31 Pac. 899; People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414.

In looking over the opinion it is noticed that on page 2, line 3, it is said: "The judgment is not void." By inadvertence the words "on its face" were omitted, and it is probably this omission that has misled counsel as to the meaning and scope of the decision. The opinion will be corrected to read: "The judgment is not void on its face."

We next considered the case in view of the whole record, including the judgment roll and statement on appeal. From the statement on appeal we found that the court had ordered the attorneys for the plaintiff to prepare findings, and that they were prepared and signed on the same day, but we held that the statement did not affirmatively show error in that it did not show that appellant did not waive service of the findings upon him, and held that the judgment could not be reversed unless error was affirmatively shown, all presumptions being in favor of the regularity of the court's rulings, finding and decision. The questions of whether the provisions of section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure were mandatory or directory were fully disposed of for the purposes of this case when we held that its provisions were passed for the benefit of individual litigants, not from considerations of public interest, and that a litigant could waive the five days' notice.

All points in the case have received careful consideration in the light of the judgment roll and statement on appeal, and, being satisfied with the conclusion reached, the petition for a rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE v. ANDERSON. (Cr. 338.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, May 23, 1916.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—§94—VIOLATION OF FISH LAW—EXTENT OF PENALTY—JURISDICTION.

St. 1915, p. 606, entitled an act to amend Pen. Code, § 636, relative to protection of fish, by section 1 provides that Pen. Code, § 636, is amended to read as follows: then follow 12 subdivisions describing the different forms of violation of the fish law, which by each subdivision are declared misdemeanors, without prescribing any penalty. Then follows section 2, merely providing that every person violating any of the provisions of "this section" shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by fine or imprisonment of not less than $100, or by imprisonment in jail for not less than 50 days, or by both. Held, that "this section" means section 636, so that a minimum punishment is prescribed for violations thereof, with the result that Pen. Code, § 19, prescribing a maximum punishment for misdemeanors except where a different punishment is prescribed by the Code, does not apply; and therefore the district court has jurisdiction of a prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 137-166; Dec. Dig. §94.]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—§111(1)—NEGATIVE EXCEPTIONS—FISH LAW.

An information for fishing in violation of Pen. Code, § 636, need not negative that defendant was a member of the game and fish commission, excepted by subdivisions 10 and 12; this being matter of excuse merely.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 295; Dec. Dig. §111(1).]

3. FISH—§15—USE OF NET—INFORMATION—"BAY."

Under Pen. Code, § 636, forbidding the casting of any net for purpose of taking fish, it is enough for an information to charge the casting thereof for such purpose within a certain bay, this implying it was cast in waters; a "bay" being composed of water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Cent. Dig. §§ 27-30; Dec. Dig. §15.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bay.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW—§1213—CRUEL OR UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT.

A fine of $500 for illegal fishing is not cruel or unusual punishment within the prohibition of Const. art. 1, § 6.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

A. J. Anderson was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

Philip B. Lynch, of Vallejo, Frank M. Silva, of Napa, and W. H. Morrissey, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was informed against by the district attorney of Napa county for the crime of violating the fishing laws of the state and was convicted of the crime charged. He moved for a new trial, which being denied, he was sentenced to pay a fine of $500, and, in default thereof, to be imprisoned in the county jail at the rate of one day for each $2 of said fine. He appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

The charge was laid under subdivision 7, § 636, of the Penal Code; the charging part of the information being as follows:

"Did willfully and unlawfully cast, extend, and use a net for the purpose of taking fish at and within fish and game district No. two (2) of the state of California, to wit, at the extreme northern end of and within Fly's Bay, in the county of Napa, state of California," etc.

Subdivision 7 of said section of the Penal Code reads as follows:

"Every person who, in fish and game districts numbers one, two, three, four, fourteen, twenty, twenty-three, twenty-four, twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, twenty-eight and twenty-nine, shall cast, extend or use, or who shall assist in casting, extending or using any net for the purpose of taking fish, mollusks or crustaceans is guilty of a misdemeanor."

[1] 1. Defendant contends that the judgment should be reversed for want of jurisdiction, the contention being that the jurisdiction is in the justice's court, under section 19 of the Penal Code, for the reason that subdivision 7, supra, makes a violation of said subdivision a misdemeanor without specifying the penalty, in which case section 19 governs. It is further contended that, to hold that the superior court has jurisdiction, "it would be necessary to construe section 2 that follows subdivision 12 of section 636 as a part of section 636." Section 2, which follows subdivision 12 of section 636 of the Penal Code, reads:

"Every person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail in the county in which conviction shall be had, not less than fifty days or both by such fine and imprisonment."

The Supreme Court, in People v. Tom Nop, 124 Cal. 150, 56 Pac. 786, held that, under section 636, Penal Code, prescribing only a minimum punishment "by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than fifty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment," for violation of the fish laws, the superior court had jurisdiction. See People v. Haagen, 139 Cal. 115, 72 Pac. 836; People v. Palermo Land, etc., Co., 4 Cal. App. 721, 89 Pac. 723, 725. We are only to determine the office of what is designated as "Sec. 2" of the act of May 19, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 606), and whether as a part of that act it refers to the preceding subdivisions.

Turning to the statute, we find it entitled: "An act to amend section six hundred thirty-six of the Penal Code of the State of California, relating to the protection of fish." Following the enacting clause the statute reads:

"Section 1. Section six hundred thirty-six of the Penal Code of the State of California is hereby amended to read as follows: 636. 1. Every person," etc.

Then follow 12 subdivisions describing the different forms of violation which by each subdivision are made misdemeanors. Following subdivision 12 is found: "Sec. 2. Every person," etc., supra. The act purports to amend section 636 of the Penal Code and so declares in what is designated as "Section 1" of the act. It seems to us that, in the so-called "Sec. 2," where it is stated, "Every person violating any of the provisions of this section," etc., reference here is intended to be to section 636, the section being amended, and not to "Sec. 2" itself. There are no "provisions" mentioned in "Sec. 2" of which there may be violations. Manifestly, the direction as to payment into the state treasury to the credit of the fish and game preservation fund "for any violation of any of the provisions of this section" refers to section 636, the subject of the amendatory act, and does not refer to this "Sec. 2," and unless it refers to section 636, i. e., to all the subdivisions of that section, no authority is given to make disposition of the fines and forfeitures therein mentioned. We must give effect to this provision of the statute if it can reasonably be done. The effect we have given seems reasonable to us and no other is possible. Indeed, the paragraph has no meaning at all and serves no purpose whatever unless it can be given the force we have attached to it.

[2] 2. It is further contended that the information does not state that any public offense was committed." The grounds for this contention are: That there is no mention in the information that defendant is not one of the persons coming within the exceptions provided by subdivisions 10 and 12 of section 636 of the Penal Code. Subdivision 10 provides that the fish and game commission may recover fish from overflowed areas isolated by receding waters, and subdivision 12 authorizes the commission to take fish by nets or traps for scientific purposes. It is claimed:

"That the information, to have stated a public offense, should have charged defendant with taking, extending, or using a net for the purpose of taking fish, etc., from the waters of some prohibited part of the state. Yes, and the information would have to go further and show that the person taking fish from the waters by a net, or otherwise, was no one of the excepted classes mentioned in subdivisions 10 and 12."

The rule as to the necessity to show in the information that the accused does not come within an excepted class is very clearly stated in Ex parte Hornef, 154 Cal. 355, 360, 97 Pac. 891, as follows:

"The question is whether the exception is so incorporated with, and becomes a part of, the enactment, as to constitute a part of the definition or description of the offense; for it is immaterial whether the exception or proviso be contained in the enacting clause or section, or be introduced in a different manner. It is the nature of the exception, and not its location, which determines the question. Neither does the question depend upon any distinction between the words 'provided' or 'except' as they may be used in the statute. In either case, the only inquiry arises, whether the matter excepted, or that which is contained in the proviso, is so incorporated with, as to become, in the manner above stated, a part of the enacting clause. If it is so incorporated, it shall be negative; otherwise it is a matter of defense."

It was further said in the opinion that:

"Such exceptions and provisos were to be negated in the pleading only where they are descriptive of the offense or define it, and that where they afford matter of excuse merely, they are to be relied on in defense" (citing cases).

We think it was not necessary in the present case to allege that defendant was not a member of the fish and game commission.

[3] Nor is there merit in the claim that the information is fatally defective because it fails to allege that defendant was using a net for the purpose of taking fish "in the waters of the state." The statute forbids the casting, extending, or using "any net for the purpose of taking fish," and the information is in the language of the statute, and it further states that the net was cast for such purpose "at the extreme end of and within Fly's Bay in the county of Napa." This, we think, was sufficient. A "bay" is defined as "an expanse of water between two capes or headlands." The place of casting the net is definitely stated as within a certain fish and game district and within a bay definitely referred to within Napa county. To allege that a net was cast in a certain bay for the purpose of taking fish implies that it was cast in waters. Fishermen do not cast their nets on land for the purpose of taking fish.

3. The court gave the following instructions:

"The defendant is accused by information in this case * * * with violating the fish and game laws of the state of California as in said information set forth. * * * I instruct you that if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant cast, extended, and used a net in the waters of Fly's Bay in Napa county as charged in the information, you must render a verdict of guilty, even that (though?) the evidence may be circumstantial or partially circumstantial."

The point urged is that the second instruction is inconsistent with the first, in that the first refers to the information and says nothing about waters while the second instruction mentions the waters of Fly's Bay. There is no inconsistency apparent. In effect, the information charged the casting of a net in waters for the reason that a bay is composed of water. The second instruction made the fact charged more definite, but cannot be said to have been inconsistent in any sense prejudicial to defendant.

[4] 4. The claim that the fine imposed was violative of the Constitution of this state and of the United States as excessive is without merit. We do not think it can be said that the punishment was of such character as to be denominated "cruel or unusual" as contemplated by section 6, art. 1, of the Constitution. People v. Oppenheimer, 156 Cal. 733, 106 Pac. 74; In re O'Shea, 11 Cal. App. 568, 105 Pac. 776.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Execution sale will not be set aside against a bona fide purchaser for a defect in the writ that is amendable, as wrong date of entry of judgment, otherwise sufficiently identified.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by John Edward Morris against Joy A. Winans. From an adverse judgment and order, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hancock & Lawrence, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment adverse to the plaintiff, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant was the purchaser at sheriff's sale of certain real property described in plaintiff's complaint. A certificate of sale and a deed were issued to him in due course. The plaintiff was the defendant in the action upon the judgment in which the execution was issued. The first judgment entered in that action was vacated on appeal, and, upon a trial being had after reversal, the final judgment was entered, which was one for restitution of premises and costs. The judgment which was set aside on appeal was for restitution and possession of premises, and the sum of $11.75, costs. The final judgment as entered thereafter was for the sum of $100 damages and $89.62, costs. Through error the writ of execution, in describing the judgment upon which it was issued, referred to the date of the first judgment instead of the last, but in all other particulars was regular and conformed to the second judgment, properly stating the amount thereof, et cetera. No motion was made to set aside the execution because of any irregularity, and the certificate of sale was issued in December, 1908. This action was commenced in October, 1910, the prayer being that the plaintiff have judgment declaring null and void the sheriff's certificate and deed.

[1] It is claimed, first, that the execution sale was void because in the writ the date of the entry of judgment was misstated in that the date given was that of the first judgment which had been set aside, and not of the last and final judgment in the action. If this irregularity rendered the writ entirely void, plaintiff was entitled to relief; otherwise not. If the writ was merely irregular and subject to an amendment, the plaintiff cannot attack it in this way as against the defendant, a purchaser for value. In the case of O'Donnell v. Merguire, 131 Cal. 527, 63 Pac. 847, 82 Am. St. Rep. 389. in considering the power of a court to amend writs, it is said:

"The power of courts to amend writs issuing from them, when defective or irregular, has long been exercised, and in modern times with increasing frequency; nor is it easy to prescribe definite limits to the power (1 Freeman on Executions, § 63); and it is also settled that, if the writ be amendable, it will be accorded the same effect, with reference to acts done in execution of it, as if it had been amended. 1 Freeman on Executions, § 71b; Hunt v. Loucks, 38 Cal. 374 [99 Am. Dec. 404]."

In Hunt v. Loucks, cited by the court in the last-mentioned case, we find this expression of the established rule:

"That, as a general rule, an execution must follow the judgment, and conform to it, and that if it varies materially from it, it will be set aside, or quashed, or amended, as the case may be, upon the motion of the parties to it, who are prejudiced by the error, is undoubtedly true, as appears by the cases cited by counsel. * * * We understand the settled rule to be that if the execution be merely erroneous—that is to say, voidable—a sale under it to a bona fide purchaser will be valid, although the execution be afterwards set aside; but if the execution be irregular—that is to say, void—a sale under it, even to a bona fide purchaser, will also be void."

In the same case the court, speaking to the question of a voidable execution as distinguished from a void one, says:

"Nor if B., who is bound to know of the variance between the judgment and the execution, does not interpose by motion for its correction, ought he to be allowed to question the title of a purchaser under it—it may be years afterward? He has a remedy by motion to amend or by action to recover the excess of the levy from the plaintiff in the execution, and the clerk, also; besides, with full knowledge of all defects, he has allowed the sheriff, acting as his agent in the matter, to sell, and the purchaser to buy, without opening his lips; and, in all fairness and justice to the latter, he must keep them closed forever" (citing cases).

The execution in this case was defective only in that the date of the entry of judgment was misstated; there was an existing valid judgment against the defendant at the time of its issuance, and the amount of that judgment was correctly stated in the writ; there was only one existing judgment and that judgment would appear by an inspection of the record, for the reference as given in the writ referred to and identified the case in which the final judgment had been entered; it was the same case in which the first judgment, entered as of the date mentioned in the execution, had been made and afterwards vacated on appeal. In Franklin v. Merida, 50 Cal. 289, that being a case where the execution erroneously recited the date of the judgment, the court said:

"Nor was there any necessity to amend the writ of execution, for, though it erroneously recited that the judgment had been rendered on the 1st day of October, 1874, still it otherwise correctly referred to the judgment in such a manner as to identify it."

Van Cleave v. Bucher, 79 Cal. 600, 21 Pac. 954, was a case wherein the writ of execution did not correctly state the amount of the judgment. The court there said:

"If amendable, the writ was not void but only voidable, and should have been served and returned by the sheriff. Freeman on Executions, § 103; Hibberd v. Smith, 50 Cal. 511."

In Sprott v. Reid, an Iowa case, reported in 3 G. Greene, 489, 56 Am. Dec. 549, a similar question was considered and the court declared its conclusion as follows:

"The variance between the date of the judgment and the date as recited in the execution is urged as sufficient to invalidate the sale. It is true, as a general rule, that the execution must pursue and be warranted by the judgment. But the variance complained of in this instance is one that might have been amended. It is one of those irregularities which should be regarded as voidable only, and we consider it not enough to invalidate the sale in a collateral proceeding like the present. The execution so describes and identifies the judgment as to render certain the authority upon which it issued, and that was sufficient to invest the sheriff with power to sell."

[2] As a ground for further objection it is said that in the certificate of sale the sheriff declared that he had offered the property for the sum of $236.55; that, under the provisions of the Code regulating the matter of execution sales, the sheriff was required to offer the property to the highest bidder at public auction. Section 694, Code Civ. Proc. It is true that the certificate of sale issued by the sheriff did contain an expression such as that described, but upon an examination of the whole document, as it is set out by copy in the transcript, we find ample recitals to the effect that the property was sold at public auction in accordance with the statute, and that Winans was the purchaser and highest bidder.

We find no error in the judgment and no sufficient reason why the order denying a new trial should be disturbed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

FONTS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (Civ. 1468.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 2, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨278(20)—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a servant's action for injury, while assisting in removing a 1,500-pound shaft from a car, held sufficient to authorize a finding of negligence of the foreman in moving it by a pinchbar while one end was elevated, so that the other came onto a steel slate causing it to slip and fall, without any warning of his intention, and while plaintiff was ignorant of such intention and had reason to believe a different method would be adopted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 972; Dec. Dig. ⇨278(20).]

2. NEW TRIAL ⇨28—GROUNDS—FAINTING ON WITNESS STAND.

That plaintiff in a personal injury case fainted while on the witness stand, there being no simulation, is not ground for giving defendant a new trial.

3. EVIDENCE ⇨512—EXPERT TESTIMONY—MODE OF MOVING HEAVY SHAFTING.

Expert opinion, in a servant's action for injuries in moving a 1,500-pound shafting from a car, as to the proper or more skillful mode of removing down an incline such an article is proper, as necessary for a correct solution by the jury of the question of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2316; Dec. Dig. ⇨512.]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨293(18)—INSTRUCTIONS—DUTY OF MASTER—METHOD OF WORK.

The instruction in a servant's action for injury in moving a heavy shafting, from the foreman causing it to fall, that it is the master's duty owing to the servant, and which it cannot delegate, to exercise reasonable and ordinary care to adopt safe rules and methods of work, is proper; the word "rules" adding nothing, and the instruction meaning simply that it is the master's duty to adopt the method for performance of the particular work, which, considering its nature and the circumstances, will be the less likely to endanger the workmen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1155, 1156; Dec. Dig. ⇨293(18).]

5. TRIAL ⇨194(19)—INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

An instruction in a servant's action for injury, that, if the jury believed from the evidence certain facts, it was defendant's duty to warn plaintiff, does not unqualifiedly tell them it was defendant's duty to warn, but leaves to their determination whether the facts were such as to have placed on defendant the duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 466; Dec. Dig. ⇨194(19).]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1170(9)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Even if it was not the master's duty to warn its servant under certain conditions, as the jury were instructed, yet the verdict for him in an action for injury being amply supported on the theory of general negligence pleaded, and it being impossible after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, to say that the error, if any, has resulted in a miscarriage of justice, there cannot, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, be a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4066, 4543; Dec. Dig. ⇨1170(9).]

7. TRIAL ⇨194(19)—INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

A requested instruction entering on the domain of fact, by unqualifiedly stating that, on the case as made, plaintiff was not defendant's employé, held to invade the province of the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Joaquin Fonts against the Southern Pacific Company. From an adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. A. Moore and Stanley Moore, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Robinson & Robinson, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appellant has not pointed out any inaccuracy in the statement of facts as made by respondent, and it may be accepted substantially as the basis for a consideration of the legal questions argued by counsel. That statement, as far as any conflict exists, is the deduction from the testimony favorable to respondent, but, of course, no valid objection on that account can be urged to our according it full credit, since it is not inherently improbable. The action was on account of personal injuries received by plaintiff while in the employment of defendant in assisting in the removal of a steel shafting from a freight car to the station platform, and resulted in a judgment in his favor for $3,000.

Plaintiff was in the general employment of C. L. Best Gas Traction Company as a moulder's helper, and had been loaned to defendant for the special work in which he was engaged when injured. He had been employed for only a few days by said traction company before the accident occurred. Said shafting was about 21½ feet long, 6 inches in diameter, and weighed about 1,500 pounds. It was smooth and round and was to be used for axles for traction engines. It was in a box car placed on a side track near Elmhurst station, and was part of a shipment which it was the duty of defendant to unload. A few days prior to the accident, one Charles Forsyth, defendant's section foreman, had tried to unload the piece of shafting with the aid of three other men, but found it was too heavy for them to handle. He therefore notified the agent at said station that he needed more men. Said agent then telephoned to said traction company for more men. Accordingly, two more men were sent, but the six were unable to lift the shafting and upon request plaintiff and another man were sent. Mr. Forsyth had sole charge of the men and was boss of the operation of unloading. The eight men were not able to lift the bar from the floor so as to carry it out of the car. Before the accident one of the workmen informed said station agent that the bar was too heavy for the men to handle. The eight men, however, after great effort, succeeded in lifting one end up to and through the window at the end of the car. The bottom of the window was about three feet and seven inches from the floor of the car and was covered with a smooth piece of steel. The car floor was entirely of wood. The end of the shaft was pushed about three feet through said window, with the other end resting upon the wooden floor about four feet from the car door. Mr. Forsyth, with a "pinch bar," proceeded to move the lower end of said shafting toward said door, moving it about two inches at a time. There was an "apron" consisting of a steel plate placed between the car and the station platform, connecting the open car door with the platform below. The station platform was several inches below the car floor, so that the steel apron was inclined at about the same angle as the shafting. The end of the steel apron extended above the car floor so that a person attempting to pinch the shafting onto the apron would be required to raise the bar several inches. This inclined steel apron had been used a great deal and had been worn smooth. While Mr. Forsyth was thus pinching the bar, the eight men were distributed along in close proximity to it, some on each side, plaintiff with two or three others having their backs toward the car door. Plaintiff occupied a position at the greatest distance from Mr. Forsyth, being at the end and corner of the car. At the time of the accident, some one was looking for rollers to place under the shafting so that it could be rolled out of the car. Before, however, the rollers could be obtained, Mr. Forsyth, without giving any warning, raised the bar onto the steel apron. It is stated by appellant that it is obvious that "the bar would slip when the end Forsyth was prying reached the steel apron. We all know that iron produces but little resistance upon iron." The shafting gave an instantaneous jump, slid for an instant, and came down like a shot. The helpers were surprised and several of them narrowly escaped injury, plaintiff having his foot and toes mashed and his body severely bruised.

The gist of plaintiff's claim from the foregoing facts is that:

"Defendant company failed to supply Forsyth with sufficient men to properly lift the bar down. Forsyth failed to warn the men of what he was going to do, but instead allowed the men to remain grouped around the shafting while he kept his intentions entirely to himself, raised the bar onto the steel shafting, and caused it to fall down. Forsyth failed to explain to his men the method of work he was going to follow, and allowed all of them to believe that he would cease pinching before the shafting reached the apron, and to believe that the bar would be lifted down from the car window rather than to be suddenly precipitated to the floor. He, alone knowing that he was going to put the smooth steel shafting upon the smooth steel apron, failed to take reasonable or any precautions to prevent this slippery piece of smooth shafting from falling upon the men grouped around it. The recklessness of this act is shown by the fact that the operation of tying a piece of rope around the center of the shafting and fastening the rope around the drawhead of the car would absolutely have prevented the shafting from falling."

[1] We think in the particular thus pointed out by respondent there is presented a sufficient case of negligence, within the purview of the authorities, to warrant the finding of the jury. In fact, it appears to us that Forsyth is chargeable with a high degree of carelessness in failing to give warning to the workmen of his intention. Of course, he may have believed and had cause to believe that they were not ignorant of his purpose, but we cannot so accept the facts. The want of knowledge on the part of plaintiff and the failure of Forsyth to apprise him of what the foreman intended to do seem to be the vital features in the case as far as the liability of defendant is concerned.

Appellant argues, with force and zeal, that the danger was so obvious that the injury must be said to be the result of respondent's own gross and stupid negligence. This view, however, assumes that he had knowledge of the conditions that made the danger imminent and manifest. This assumption, however, as we view it, constitutes the false premise in appellant's argument. There is room for the inference, let us repeat, that not only did plaintiff have no intimation or knowledge that Forsyth intended or was about to raise the end of the bar onto the apron, but he had reason to believe that an entirely different method would be adopted.

In addition to the foregoing contention many points are made by appellant, some of which, presented in the opening brief, are apparently abandoned in the closing argument and will, therefore, receive no specific attention.

[2] Among the incidents of the trial—quite out of the ordinary, we should say—is what respondent denominates the "fainting episode." Plaintiff, while on the witness stand, lost consciousness and fell from his chair. The contention in brief is that this circumstance must have excited the sympathy of the jury, which controlled or at least influenced their verdict. In the morning he had been on the stand for some time within which he had exhibited his injured foot to the jury. In the afternoon he had undergone a searching cross-examination for probably an hour, when the unfortunate incident occurred. Defendant did not complain of it for several days thereafter, nor is there any contention that the plaintiff was not fully cross-examined after he recovered from his indisposition.

Respondent charges the incident to the menacing conduct of appellant's counsel, and claims that if any detriment was suffered thereby they are responsible for it. It is also argued that, under the peculiar circumstances developed by the cross-examination, the temporary collapse of the witness probably injured his own cause rather than that of his adversary. From a reading of the record we are not justified in holding that there was anything improper in the conduct of said counsel, but we can readily understand how a plaintiff, unacquainted with court proceedings, nervous from sickness and suffering, unfamiliar with our language, and naturally timorous under the influence of a strange judicial investigation, might necessarily misconstrue what was said and done, and be affected thereby as grievously as is claimed. However, we need not pursue the subject as, of course, we cannot say that the verdict of the jury was influenced thereby. The presumption is, manifestly, that they regarded their oaths and determined the cause according to the law and the evidence. If there had been simulation on the part of plaintiff or other intentional misconduct, the case would be obviously different. But to grant a new trial in consequence of the unavoidable illness of plaintiff, sudden though it be and in the presence of the jury, would certainly be something novel in the history of judicial proceedings.

[3] One of the considerations in the case treated most seriously grows out of the action of the court in overruling the objection of appellant to a question propounded to one James Henneberry, an experienced drayman. The interrogatory is of considerable length, reciting the facts as to the freight car, the length and weight of the shaft, its position resting upon the window and the floor of the car, the position of the sheet iron apron, the act in moving the lower end of said shaft towards the door of the car and culminating in throwing said shaft onto said apron, nothing else being done in the way of anchoring the shaft or preventing it from slipping, and concluding:

"That on either side of this piece of shafting were stationed seven men, besides one who was doing the prying with that bar; it being the plan, after having lifted this shaft into the window, to take it down again in the manner in which they had raised it, that is, by the men themselves. Would you say, under the circumstances, that was a proper mode of taking the shaft from the car?"

The objection was that—

"it is not a fair statement or a hypothetical question; also because the matter is not the subject of expert evidence. It does not lay within the domain of expert evidence at all."

Cal.Rep. 158-161 P.—19

The answer was: "I do not think so." A similar objection was also overruled to the following question:

"What reasonable precautions could have been exercised in order to prevent this shaft slipping through and from the window and falling to the floor, as it did, as detailed in my question?"

The answer was:

"The simple method would be to lash it to prevent it from slipping. Just lash a piece of rope around about the center of the shaft, and a couple of men take hold of the end of the rope, prevent it slipping out of the door."

The witness further explained, over objection:

"I would have blocked up under the shaft on the floor of the car. That would be the proper precaution to prevent it from falling to the floor, to put some blocks across here, which would also be underneath that piece of shafting, and after it was pried to the door, to have the block with the end on rollers, to get it out afterwards."

The first objection going to the hypothetical character of the question is not pressed, and we may pass it by with the remark that a basis for the question is found in the record.

The second objection, viz., that the matter about which the witness was asked to give his opinion is not among those subjects as to which expert testimony is necessary and allowable, is not in our opinion, well taken. The general rule is, of course—

"that the opinions of witnesses are never to be received as evidence where all the facts upon which such opinions are founded can be ascertained and made intelligible to the court or jury." 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 441b.

Or, as the proposition was clearly stated by Campbell, J., in Evans v. People, 12 Mich. 35:

"Where the court or jury can make their own deductions, they shall not be made by those testifying. In all cases, therefore, where it is possible to inform the jury fully enough to enable them to dispense with the opinions or deductions of witnesses from things noticed by themselves or described by others, such opinions or deductions should not usually be received."

The general test, then is: Is the matter upon which the opinion of a witness may be asked one as to which the jury themselves are capable of forming a judgment from a description thereof by other witnesses? And, measured by this test, we are inclined to the belief, as before stated, that the opinion of the witness in this case as to the proper or the more skillful mode of removing, down an incline, a heavy, cumbersome, and unwieldy steel shafting, such as the one described in this case, from a freight car to the station platform, was not only proper, but necessary, to a correct solution by the jury of the ultimate question whether the plaintiff's injuries were sustained through the negligence of the defendant by its employé in immediate charge of the work. As seen, the shafting was smooth and round, and weighed about 1,500 pounds. Quite naturally, when raised to an inclined position, it would easily slide downwards and, if not properly handled, with suddenness and great force. This would particularly be the result where, as here, the smooth iron or steel shafting is moved onto and over a steel-plated apron, worn smooth by use, and inclined at approximately the same angle as the shafting itself. It is therefore plainly manifest that no person but one accustomed to the handling of such heavy and unwieldy materials would know precisely the proper method which, under all the circumstances shown here, ought reasonably to be adopted for the removal of such a piece of iron or steel, of the heft and unwieldiness of the shafting in this case, from one place to another with safety to those engaged or employed in the work of such removal, where, as in the present case, the removal required the shunting of the iron down an incline to the place to which it was to be removed. How such removal is to be accomplished with safety to those engaged in the work of removal is a matter which can obviously be the better determined by those who have had experience in the handling of ponderous and unwieldy materials. It is extremely doubtful whether the average jurymen or average judge would be able to say, from the manner of the removal of the shafting from the freight car to the platform as described by witnesses in this case, whether the method so shown was the proper method for its removal to insure the protection of those engaged in so removing it against injury or misadventure of any sort.

As shown, the witness Henneberry was an experienced drayman and as such had been accustomed to handling heavy and cumbersome materials of all kinds. By this experience he undoubtedly acquired a skill in the loading and unloading of heavy freight under a variety of circumstances which a person having no such experience could not be expected to be possessed of. Necessarily a person of such experience would know much better, than one having no such experience, how to proceed in such a case and to prosecute the work of removal according to that method which his experience had taught him was the safer or the less attended by danger to those actively connected with the work. And necessarily, therefore, his opinion as to the proper method of carrying on the work would be superior to that of the jury founded upon the testimony of witnesses who had given only a general description of the circumstances under which the work of removal was attempted. It hence follows that the matter upon which the witness was permitted to express his opinion was not one within the common knowledge of men, and that the testimony was proper and necessary to an enlightened consideration and a correct disposition of the ultimate issue. The conclusion thus reached upon this point is, we think, sustained by the cases. A few of these we may well refer to.

In Dyas v. Southern Pacific Co., 140 Cal. 296, 73 Pac. 972, the plaintiff was injured by an insecure derrick and the court held that:

"Derricks being of such limited use and complicated construction that an ordinary person is not familiar therewith, civil engineers of long experience, who are familiar with the mechanical principles on which they are constructed and operated and with their strength and use, are competent to testify as expert witnesses in relation thereto, and as to the sufficiency and security of the counterbalancing and fastening of the derrick in question."

The case is an instructive one and sets forth clearly the principle upon which such evidence is admitted.

Snyder v. Holt Manufacturing Co., 134 Cal. 324, 66 Pac. 311, was an action for personal injuries, caused by reason of the separation of a defective bolt and nut used to connect the header and separator in a side-hill combined harvester, manufactured for and sold to the plaintiff by the defendant, and it was held that:

"The question whether the bolt and nut were proper and sufficient for the coupling together of the parts of the harvester is peculiarly one for the evidence of a qualified expert, experienced in the construction of such machinery for the purpose intended."

In Silveira v. Iversen, 128 Cal. 190, 60 Pac. 688, it was held proper to ask a witness: "How can it be determined, Mr. Erickson, whether a rope has become rotten and unsound?"

In Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017, plaintiff was injured through the negligent construction of a jetty, and witnesses were called as experts in his behalf for the purpose of showing that the structure to which a certain mat was suspended was not properly constructed to sustain the weight of the mat, and also to show what weight a cap of the dimensions of the one in question would sustain. These questions were objected to by the defendant, upon the ground that it was for the jury to determine, from the facts that might be shown in the case, whether the structure was properly made. But the Supreme Court said:

"These objections were properly overruled. The matters sought to be shown by these witnesses * * * were matters not presumably within the common knowledge of men, and were eminently proper to be shown by those who had made these subjects a matter of special study. Prenoble v. Connecticut River Mfg. Co., 160 Mass. 131 [35 N. E. 675]."

In Howland v. Oakland C. St. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 513, 42 Pac. 983, expert testimony was admitted as to whether defendant's car could, with proper care and attention, have been stopped in time to avoid a collision and the Supreme Court said:

"Nor is there any question but that the subject was one upon which the opinion of the witness was admissible. The manner of running electric cars, their rate of speed, and the facility with which they can be stopped or handled is not a matter of such common knowledge that the jury could judge as intelligently as one skilled in their use. It was therefore proper to resort to expert evidence."

Mulholland v. Western Gas Construction Co., 21 Cal. App. 44, 131 Pac. 110, involved personal injuries through the explosion of a scrubber in a plant, and a witness was permitted to answer over objection these questions:

"Is it proper, considering the safety of employes, to equip a scrubber without steam pipes? What is necessary to make a plant reasonably safe for the protection of the plant? Is the steam pipe necessary for the safety of the men in and about the plant?"

It is true that the court said that, "if his answer as to what would be a safe way to equip a scrubber stood alone without explanation, we should be inclined to hold that the overruling of objection thereto was prejudicial error," but the witness gave the reasons for his conclusion and this rendered innocuous the form of the question, so the court held, intimating, however, that it was so largely a matter of discretion with the lower court that if the ruling had been the other way it would not have been error.

In McLain v. Dahlstrom M. Door Co., 19 Cal. App. 475, 126 Pac. 391, plaintiff was injured by an insecure elevator and it was held that the lower court properly allowed evidence to show the insecurity of a knot such as that shown, and the mode of tying knots in such a way as to prevent slipping and accident, which is proper matter of skill, and to show the weakness which was apparent from an inspection of the insecure knot, if had.

In Colsch v. Chicago Railroad Co., 149 Iowa, 176, 127 N. W. 198, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1013, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 915, it was declared that expert testimony is admissible on the question of the proper loading of live stock in a car.

In Leslie v. Granite Ry. Co., 172 Mass. 468, 52 N. E. 542, it was held that an expert can testify as to the methods of handling heavy stones with a derrick.

In Smith v. Dow, 43 Wash. 407, 86 Pac. 555, the court declared that an expert may state that the method used in tying lumber for hoisting was not safe.

In Palmquist v. Mine & Smelter Co., 25 Utah, 257, 70 Pac. 994, it was held, in an action for personal injury alleged to have been sustained in moving a boiler, that expert evidence as to the proper method of moving boilers and the appliances ordinarily connected therewith is competent.

For further illustration of the application of the rule permitting opinion testimony, we refer to the following cases: Zarnik v. Reiss Coal Co., 133 Wis. 290, 113 N. W. 752; Ala. So. Ry. v. Vail, 155 Ala. 382, 46 South. 587; O'Brien v. Look, 171 Mass. 36, 50 N. E. 458; Wolfe v. Mosler Safe Co., 139 App. Div. 848, 124 N. Y. Supp. 541, a case which, on its facts, is strikingly similar to the case at bar; Meily v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co., 215 Mo. 567, 114 S. W. 1013.

Counsel for the appellant cite many cases which, they insist, support the view that the opinion of the witness Henneberry was upon a matter within the knowledge of the jury or, in other words, not within the range of those subjects upon which the opinions of experts may be received. We need not take the time to review herein all those cases. It is sufficient to say that we have carefully read them and found no difficulty in distinguishing them from the present case. The facts are wholly different from those of this case. The opinion testimony which had been allowed by the trial courts in those cases, and which the appellate courts held to be incompetent and inadmissible, related to ordinary matters as to which the average person could form a correct opinion without the aid of the opinion of those claiming to have had special experience in such matters. For instance, it was held by the Supreme Court of Iowa that the opinion of a witness as to the number of men necessary properly and safely to move a locomotive tender loaded with coal by means of a pinch bar was upon a matter which the jury themselves were competent to determine from a simple statement of the facts. Cahow v. Chicago Ry., 113 Iowa, 224, 84 N. W. 1056. And likewise, in an action wherein the plaintiff set up personal injury through the negligence of the defendant in not properly securing pipe which was being hoisted in bundles of six, it being claimed that the defendant had negligently failed to place bagging at the end of the bundle and thus secured it so as to prevent the single piece from falling out, it was held that the opinion of a witness that the pipes were properly fastened was not admissible; the matter upon which such opinion was given not being such as to require the opinion of an expert. The court said that:

"The witness could properly state the relative efficiency of different methods of hoisting the pipe; but when he was asked to state whether it was necessary, in the proper performance of a duty, to attach bagging to the end of the pipes, he was asked the question which the jury could determine upon a statement of simple facts." New York Electric Co. v. Blair, 79 Fed. 896, 25 C. C. A. 216.

In the present case, it will be noted, the witness was not asked how many men would be required to move the shafting properly and with safety; nor (it may be added) was he asked whether the method adopted for the removal of the shafting was unsafe or characterized by inherent or other negligence. He was, as seen, merely asked if the manner in which it was attempted to remove the shafting, as shown by the testimony of the witnesses, was the proper way to do the work, which, it is clear (as counsel suggest), involved certain complex operations. And he not only declared that the method adopted was not the proper way of handling the heavy and cumbersome article under the circumstances, but (as an expert should) explained the reasons for his conclusion. In brief, the whole sum of the witness' testimony was the expression of an opinion upon the relative efficiency of different methods of unloading and removing the shafting. New York Electric Co. v. Blair, supra.

Counsel for the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, devote considerable space in their briefs in criticism of the alleged refusal by the trial court to grant their client's alleged motion for a nonsuit. But a reply to the extended argument addressed to that proposition is to be found in the fact that, while it appears that a motion for a nonsuit was made by the corporation, C. L. Best Gas Traction Company, which was joined with the Southern Pacific Company as a party defendant, and the same granted, it nowhere is made to appear in the record that the Southern Pacific Company made any such motion.

[4] The next assignments involve attacks upon certain portions of the court's charge to the jury, and upon the action of the court in refusing to allow certain instructions proposed and requested by the defendant. The first of the given instructions to which objection is made reads:

"I instruct you that it is the duty of the master to exercise reasonable and ordinary care to adopt safe rules and methods of work, and that this is a personal duty which the master owes to its servant, and which cannot be delegated or transferred to another in such manner as to relieve it, the master, from responsibility thereof."

That said instruction contains a correct statement of a legal principle in the abstract there can be no doubt; and we are unable to perceive why it is not a rule which may appropriately be stated in almost any case of personal injuries where the latter are alleged to have been sustained by a servant through the negligence of his master while such servant is engaged in the performance of duties the execution of which is attended by more or less danger to the employé.

It has been declared by the text-writers and uniformly held by the courts that:

"It is the duty of railroad companies to exercise reasonable care in the matter of safeguarding and protecting their employés, while engaged in the discharge of their duties as such against the negligence of common employés, or their own negligence through the operation of cars or other machinery, and, to that end, make, promulgate, and enforce reasonable rules for the government of their employés in the performance of their duties as such." Payne v. Oakland Traction Co., 15 Cal. App. 127, 144, 113 Pac. 1074, 1081, and the authorities therein cited.

Of course, this rule is applicable only where the master is engaged in a complex or dangerous business, or a business the carrying on of which is, by reason of its intricate character and other conditions, itself dangerous to employés engaged in the work of actually prosecuting it; and, manifestly, whether in any particular case such rules should be made and promulgated must depend upon the nature or character of the business and the conditions necessarily surrounding the prosecution thereof.

But even if this were a case to which the rule above mentioned is not strictly applicable, we yet are unable to perceive in the instruction anything which renders it inapplicable to this case; for, as we read and construe it, the instruction, as before suggested, merely states a principle of law quite pertinent to nearly all cases in which an employé claims damages for personal injuries received while engaged in the performance of work for his employer. There clearly can be no doubt that, in any case, it is the duty of the master to use and employ all reasonable precautions for the safety of those in his service and to that end provide his employés with the safest reasonably available methods and means which may be employed for carrying on the work. Bush v. Wood, 8 Cal. App. 647, 656, 97 Pac. 709; Buzzell v. Laconia Man. Co., 48 Me. 113, 77 Am. Dec. 212, and cases therein cited. And this is in effect all that the above instruction declared to the jury. If the word "rules" were omitted from the instruction, no possible question could arise as to the applicability of the instruction to this or (as before suggested) almost any other case of personal injury which was sustained by a servant while prosecuting work assigned to him by his employer. We cannot see, however, that the use of the word "rules," unaccompanied by a full exposition of the rule requiring in certain circumstances employers to adopt, promulgate, and enforce rules for the guidance of their employés while actually engaged in the discharge of the duties of their employment, makes the instruction say anything more than what it would have imparted to the jury with that word eliminated. What the instruction really means and was undoubtedly intended to convey was, not that it was the duty of the company to promulgate and enforce set rules according to which the unloading of cars should uniformly be carried on (a course which, in its application to work so varied in character, it would at least seem is not feasible or practicable), but that, as to the particular work in hand, because of its rather intricate character, it was the duty of the defendant to furnish its employés employed in the work with proper appliances and to point out the proper method for performing it with safety to themselves. In short, the instruction, justly and rationally construed by the light of the connection in which it is applied, simply means that it is a duty legally resting upon the master to adopt that method for the performance of the particular work which, considering the nature of the work and the circumstances under which it must be performed, will be the less likely to endanger the lives or limbs of the employes engaged in performing it. As so construed and as no doubt the jury so understood it, the instruction, as before stated, merely declares a general principle applicable to the relations existing between master and servant and announces one of the general duties owing from the former to the latter. What less than this could reasonably be expected or required of an employer in any case or under any circumstances, we are unable to conceive.

[5] The next complaint of the appellant is aimed at the action of the court in reading to the jury several instructions in which it was stated, in substance, that, if they believed from the evidence that the method adopted for unloading the shafting or bar in question from the car was a perilous one and—

“that the perils of the method so adopted were known to defendant’s foreman before or at the time of the accident, and believe that the plaintiff did not know and in the exercise of reasonable care should not have known of such peril, then it became the duty of such foreman or boss to notify the plaintiff thereof; and if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff was injured solely by reason of such failure of duty to notify the plaintiff, then in that case I instruct you that your verdict must be against the defendant * * * and for the plaintiff.”

One of the grounds of objection to the above instruction and others addressed to the same proposition is that thereby the court unqualifiedly and plainly told the jury that the duty to give warning rested on the defendant. It is further claimed that the instructions were wholly inappropriate to this case, since (so it is argued) the danger attending the act of unloading the heavy and unwieldy bar was so obvious that such danger must have been plainly patent to the plaintiff and the other workmen assisting in the work; hence, so it is urged, the instructions must be assumed and held to have unduly influenced the jury against the defendant.

We are not prepared to acquiesce in the propositions so stated. A reading of the instructions will readily disclose that there exists no tangible ground for declaring that they did not fairly and plainly submit to the sole determination of the jury the question whether the facts were such as to have placed upon the defendant the duty of warning the plaintiff of the perils or hazards of the work in which he was temporarily engaged.

[6] As to the second ground of objection to the instructions, we perceive no necessity for entering into an analysis of the situation as it is presented here to show that the doctrine of warning was, as we believe is true, pertinent to this case. Briefly, we may observe that there are considerations exposed by the evidence upon which the propriety of such instructions in this case may well and reasonably be maintained. The plaintiff, however, relied upon general negligence as well as upon alleged special acts of omission on the part of the defendant which constitute actionable negligence. The verdict is amply supported upon the theory of the general negligence set up in the complaint.

Therefore, even if it were true and necessary to declare that warning by the foreman to the employés of certain unexpected perils necessarily arising in such a case and which perils are obvious to experienced persons, but not so to the one inexperienced in such work, as the evidence shows the plaintiff to have been, was not among the duties legally resting upon the defendant in this case, yet, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, we cannot justly say that the error in giving the instructions upon that subject, if error it was, has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Const.

[7] Counsel for the appellant concede that no just fault can be found with that portion of the court’s charge in which it was declared that, if the C. L. Best Company loaned the plaintiff to the Southern Pacific Company for the special service of unloading the iron bar, and that the plaintiff came under the sole power of control and direction of the latter company, and that plaintiff expressly or impliedly consented thereto, then and in that event the plaintiff for the time being became the servant of said Southern Pacific Company; but they insist that the court erred, to the prejudice of their client, by refusing to state the converse of that proposition as proposed in their own language. But, as we read the instruction upon that subject as proffered by the Southern Pacific Company, it goes further than merely to state the converse of said rule upon a hypothetical or assumed situation for which there might be support in the evidence. It would have told the jury unqualifiedly and unconditionally that, upon the case as made, the plaintiff was not an employé and under the control of the Southern Pacific Company. Clearly, the instruction as so proposed is inconsistent with the one given, entered upon the domain of fact, and was properly refused.

[8] Objections are urged against some other instructions dealing with other questions arising in the case. To these we deem it unnecessary to give special attention herein; for, as to the action of the court with reference to the instructions, it is enough to say generally that we have carefully examined the entire charge of the court and have found that, generally speaking, it states all the principles of law pertinent to the issues with accuracy and clearness. And for this reason there is no ground for holding that the court erred in rejecting certain instructions proposed by the defendant. It is obviously true that a principle or rule of law, pertinent to the issues and once stated, is not required to be repeated in other portions of the charge. The rejected instructions in effect merely embraced a repetition of principles in different forms of language which the court announced and submitted to the jury.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HOVIS. (Cr. 627.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 12, 1916.)

CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 511(2)—EVIDENCE OF ACCOMPLICES—SUFFICIENCY OF CORROBORATION.

Evidence held to sufficiently corroborate testimony of accomplice in larceny of automobile, being in itself sufficient, without the aid of the accomplice's testimony, to connect accused with the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1129; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 511(2).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Ralph C. Hovis was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment and order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Curtis C. Legerton, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the crime of grand larceny, and from an order denying the defendant a new trial.

The only point urged upon the hearing of this appeal is as to whether or not the testimony of the accomplice of the defendant in the theft of the property—an automobile—has been sufficiently corroborated by other evidence to satisfy the requirements of the statute. We have carefully examined the record, and are satisfied that there is ample evidence which of itself and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime.

The testimony of the accomplice Daley was to the effect that in conversation with the defendant Hovis shortly before the commission of the crime, with reference to the taking and disposal of an automobile, the defendant had told him that if he (Daley) would get the machine the defendant Hovis would tell him where to take it and show him where he could sell the machine, and that they would share the proceeds. He also testified circumstantially to the efforts of himself and the defendant to dispose of the machine after it had been stolen. Other and independent witnesses testified that Hovis and Daley were seen together with the machine on the day of its theft; that they took it to a garage together and left it there for two or three weeks; that the defendant applied to a man named Allyn, who lived in San Jose, to help him find a purchaser for such a machine for a young friend of his who wanted to make a quick sale. Mr. Allyn referred him to a Mr. Seifert in San Jose who might become a purchaser, whereupon the defendant and Daley took the machine to San Jose, where they went under assumed names, and where they attempted to have Seifert purchase the machine, and from whom they received $25 on account of a sale; that not long after the theft of the machine he went to the office of a lawyer in San Francisco, and there caused to be made out the form of a bill of sale of an automobile, leaving blank the place for its description, which was afterward filled in with the description of the stolen machine.

We think these facts amply sufficient to furnish the needed corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice under the rule as laid down in the case of People v. Leavens, 12 Cal. App. 178, 106 Pac. 1103.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PORTER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2089.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 31, 1916.)

1. PROCESS $\hookrightarrow$ 96(4)—SERVICE BY PUBLICATION—AFFIDAVIT OF NONRESIDENCE.

An affidavit for publication, alleging that defendant never resided in California, but that her home and residence was a certain address in Massachusetts, held sufficient to support an order for publication, under Code Civ. Proc. § 412, authorizing publication where defendant resides outside the state.

Mandamus proceedings by Walter Porter against the Superior Court of the State of California for the County of Los Angeles, Hon. J. P. Wood, Judge thereof, and Hannah M. Porter. Writ granted.

Lewis Cruickshank, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

JAMES, J. Petition for mandate. From the facts stated in the petition it appears that the petitioner herein, in August, 1915, filed a complaint in the superior court of Los Angeles county by which action a decree of divorce was sought. After summons had been issued and returned by the sheriff without service, an affidavit was made and filed by the plaintiff, upon which affidavit the court, by Hon. Lewis R. Works, made its order directing service of summons to be made by publication. As grounds for the order the affidavit set out that the last known residence and address of the defendant was at—

"69 Lakeview avenue, Lynn, Massachusetts; that defendant at all times since the commencement of this action and for some time prior thereto was and is now an actual bona fide resident of the state of Massachusetts; that defendant is not now nor has she ever been, a resident of the state of California, nor has she ever resided in said state of California; affiant knows that a search anywhere in said county or state would be of no avail; * * * that the home of the defendant at the time of the commencement of this action and for some time prior thereto was 69 Lakeview avenue, Lynn, Massachusetts; that she was the owner of said property and made her home therein."

It is recited that the publication of summons was duly made, and that a copy of the summons and complaint, as required by the order of court, was deposited in the United States mail as registered matter, and was on the 2d day of September, 1915, actually delivered personally to the defendant in the divorce action; that the proof of publication of summons was regularly made and filed, and default entered; that thereafter the case was duly and regularly set for trial, to be heard on the 15th day of February, 1916, before Hon. J. P. Wood, judge of said court; that, at the time the case came on for hearing, the court, "deciding on his own motion" that the affidavit for the order for publication of summons was insufficient, struck the cause from the calendar; that the following minute order was thereupon made:

"It is hereby ordered that default of defendant be set aside and that another affidavit for publication of summons be filed, and further that the summons be republished and cause off calendar to be reset."

It is as to the authority of the court to make the last order mentioned that question is made by the petition filed herein. It may be noted that the order as set out does not purport to vacate the order made directing that summons be served by publication, but only that the default of the defendant be set aside. It does appear to direct that another affidavit for publication of summons be filed and the summons republished; but, so far as the record presented shows, the order made by the first-named judge, authorizing the service of summons by publication, still exists, and has never been modified or changed. But evidently this order was intended to have the effect of setting aside the order as made by Judge Works, and it seems to be assumed in this proceeding that it may be treated as of such effect. The return made herein does not call into question the verity of any of the material facts set out by the petitioner, but there is attached to the return a copy of the rules of the superior court.

[1, 2] Our attention is particularly directed to rule 28 of that court, which provides that in any application for an order to publish summons, if the residence (of the defendant) is known and stated in the affidavit, "the affiant must also give the information upon which such statement of residence is made, and if the information is contained in a letter, such letter must be attached to the affidavit." Section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that service of summons may be made by publication "where the person on whom service is to be made resides out of the state, or has departed from the state, or cannot, after due diligence, be found within the state. * * *" In order to authorize the making of the order, such facts as are relied upon must be established to the satisfaction of the court. If the affidavit presents facts sufficient to establish either of the conditions specified in section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the court acts thereon, granting the order, such order will be good and valid, notwithstanding that the court in its discretion might have, before making such order, required further proof to be made. The affidavit in this case plainly and directly stated that the defendant never had been a resident of the state of California, that she never had resided in the state, and that her home and residence was in Lynn, Mass., the particular street number being given. These statements were sufficient prima facie to support a valid order of publication. McKendrick v. Western Zinc Min. Co., 165 Cal. 24, 130 Pac. 865. The important thing was to prove to the satisfaction of the judge making the order for publication that the defendant did not reside within the state. All that the rule of the superior court to which our attention has been called requires is that, in making proof of the facts as to the residence of an absent defendant, the affidavit "must also give the information upon which such statement of residence is made, and if the information is contained in a letter, such letter must be attached to the affidavit." If the allegations of the affidavit were sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the fact was that the defendant resided out of the state at the time of the application, regardless of whether the rule of the superior court had been strictly followed or not, the order for publication of summons would be fully authorized under the section of the Code we have mentioned.

[3] There is no doubt of the right of a judge to vacate an order for publication of summons where, upon examination of the affidavit, he finds a total lack of a statement of facts sufficient to authorize the order to be made in the first instance; and we may say further that such right might exist where it appeared that the affidavit was fraudulent. No such ground as the last mentioned is suggested here. The fact that a different judge than the one who made the first order acted in attempting to set it aside is of no moment. The second named judge would have no greater authority—and no less—than the judge who first examined the affidavit and passed upon its sufficiency. We think that the petitioner is entitled to the relief asked for.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue, requiring the respondent court to reset the cause on the trial calendar and hear the same within such reasonable time as may be convenient, considering the business of the court. Petitioner to recover his costs herein incurred.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action by Archie J. Hicks against Harry J. Butterworth. From an order denying his motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Will H. Willis and Davis & Rush, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Harriman, Ryckman & Tuttle, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff on account of trespass committed by defendant's livestock. The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff, upon which a judgment was entered against defendant, whose motion for a new trial was denied, and from which order he appeals.

It appears that plaintiff was a tenant in possession, under a lease from the owner, of the premises involved, upon which at the time of the trespass he had certain fields of alfalfa growing, and a lot of unbaled hay in the stack; that during the period extending from July 1 to November 1, 1910, defendant's neat cattle entered upon said land, ate and destroyed the growing alfalfa and stacks of hay thereon. Neither the complaint nor proof showed the premises to have been, at the time, inclosed by a substantial fence, and appellant, conceding the trespass and resultant damage as alleged, insists that plaintiff is not entitled to recover therefor. In 1878 the Legislature passed an act entitled, "An act concerning trespassing of animals upon private lands in certain counties in the state of California" (Stats. 1877-78, p. 176), which act and the provisions thereof were by an amendment thereto approved March 30, 1878 (Stats. 1877-78, p. 878), made to include the county of Los Angeles. This act provides:

"Section 1. It is unlawful for any animal, the property of any person, to enter upon any land owned by or lawfully in the possession of any person other than the owner of such animal.

"Sec. 2. The owner of, or person who is in the lawful possession of, any land trespassed upon, in violation of this act, is entitled to recover, by action in a court of competent jurisdiction, from the owner of, or person in possession of, or person chargeable with the care of, the trespassing animal or animals, all damage sustained by reason of any such trespass, together with costs of suit."

Under the act of 1878 just quoted, no doubt exists as to the plaintiff's right to recover damages for the trespass, since under its provisions he was not required to inclose his land with a fence, substantial or otherwise. Appellant, however, insists that said provisions of the act of 1878 were repealed by an act of the Legislature entitled, "An act concerning trespassing of animals upon private lands, and the recovery of damages resulting therefrom" (Stats. 1907, p. 999), sections 1, 2 and 6 of which are as follows:

"Section 1. It is unlawful for any person, firm or corporation owning, or having possession of, any animal, to suffer or permit such animal to break into and enter upon any land owned by, or lawfully in the possession of any person, firm or corporation, other than the owner of such animal, in all cases where such land is planted to growing crops, vines, fruit trees, or vegetables, and is at the time entirely inclosed by a substantial fence or other inclosure.

"Section 2. The owner of, or person who is in the lawful possession of, any land trespassed upon, in violation of this act, is entitled to recover, by action in a court of competent jurisdiction, from the owner of, or person in possession of, or person chargeable with the care of, the trespassing animal or animals, all actual damages sustained by reason of such trespass, together with costs of suit."

"Section 6. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed; provided, nothing in this act shall be deemed or construed to repeal an act of the Legislature of this state relating to estrays, approved March 23, 1901."

[1] If, as claimed by appellant, the act of 1907 supersedes the provisions of the act of 1878, then it is likewise clear that plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages by reason of the trespass, since it is not claimed the premises were inclosed in any manner whatsoever. In effect, the act of 1878, as at common law, requires the owner of stock to fence them in, and no duty devolves upon the owner of land to inclose the same in order to prevent his neighbor's stock trespassing thereon, and unless repealed by the act of 1907, it is the law in Los Angeles county applicable to the facts of this case.

Appellant has presented a very able and exhaustive brief in support of his contention that the later act repeals that of 1878; and, were the question an open one, we would feel constrained to follow counsel through the maze of legislation touching the subject, commencing with the first session of the Legislature in 1850, to which he directs attention. The identical question, however, was before the court in the case of Blevins v. Mullally, decided by the Third Appellate District, 22 Cal. App. 519, 135 Pac. 307. The action arose from a trespass of stock upon land in Colusa county, to which the act of 1878 applied, and, as here, it was there contended that such act was repealed by the act of 1907. The court, however, held otherwise, saying there was no inconsistency between the common-law rule as declared in the act of 1878 and the statute of 1907, and hence there was no repeal of the provisions of the former. This being true, it follows that in Los Angeles county one sustaining damage by reason of trespassing animals upon his uninclosed land may, under the provisions of the act of 1878, recover therefor, regardless of whether the crops be growing thereon or matured, as, alfalfa hay, and stacked thereon.

It is unnecessary to repeat the argument upon which the court, through Justice Hart, based its conclusion; suffice it to say that a petition to have the cause heard in the Supreme Court after judgment in the District Court of Appeal was denied by the Supreme Court. Hence, thus approved, the question, so far as this court is concerned, is no longer an open one. Upon the authority of the decision in Blevins v. Mullally, supra, we are constrained to hold that the act of 1878, the effect of which, as at common law, is to require the owners of stock to fence them in, is, so far as Los Angeles county is concerned, still in force, and that plaintiff's failure to maintain a substantial fence inclosing his land did not affect his right to recover damages for the trespass.

From what has been said, it follows that no error was committed by the court in refusing instructions requested by defendant, based upon his theory that the law imposed upon plaintiff the duty of fencing his land as a protection against damages by trespassing animals. The fact that plaintiff did not keep the fence inclosing the land in repair, or failed to keep the gates closed, becomes immaterial.

[2] It is next insisted that the court erred in charging the jury—

"that the undisputed evidence in this case shows the plaintiff had such possession and interest in the land here in question, the crops and herbage growing thereon and the hay stacked upon the land, to enable him to maintain an action for the damage done thereto by trespassing cattle."

And in refusing, at defendant's request, to instruct the jury to the effect that if plaintiff was not the owner of the land in question, but leased it upon terms and conditions known as "farming on shares," and the crops growing thereon belonged partly to the plaintiff and partly to the owner of the land, then, in such event, plaintiff could recover only for damages done to that portion of the crop belonging to him, and could not recover damages for any portion belonging to the landlord. This contention is based upon the claim that plaintiff and the landlord were owners in common of the crops grown upon said land. By the terms of the lease made to plaintiff, he, as rental for the land, agreed to cut the alfalfa crops grown thereon, at his own cost, charge, and expense, and stack the same upon the said premises, and in due and proper time bale the same and deliver to the landlord an amount in tonnage equal to one-half of all alfalfa cut on said premises, which one-half should be set apart to the landlord. Clearly, the relation existing between the parties was that of landlord and tenant. The lease contains no provision indicating that the products were to be held in cotenancy, but were held and controlled by the tenant, one-half thereof, when baled, under the terms of the lease, to be set apart to and paid the landlord as compensation for the use of the land. Coalinga, etc., Co. v. Associated Oil Co., 16 Cal. App. 361, 116 Pac. 1107; Clarke & Cain v. Cobb, 121 Cal. 595, 54 Pac. 74; Holt Manufacturing Co. v. Thornton, 136 Cal. 232, 68 Pac. 708. The record discloses no evidence that the crop had been divided as provided in the lease, or any portion thereof set apart to the landlord. Under these facts, there was no error in the instruction given. As said by the court in Reeves v. Hannan, 65 N. J. Law, 249, 48 Atl. 1018, in discussing a like question:

"The agreement * * * being a lease, the title of the crops produced did not vest in the parties to it as tenants in common, but solely in Reeves, the tenant; and Hannan, the landlord, had no claim upon them until an actual division was made, and his share was turned over to him as a 'reditus' or rent."

The order appealed from is affirmed.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ~~vs.~~ 22(3)—
APPOINTMENT—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

An order appointing a special administrator and purporting to be made in a formal proceeding initiated by a written application, is outside the court's jurisdiction, where no application was on file, notwithstanding the petitioners PER CURIAM. It seems to us that that part of the return of the judge of the superior court, reciting that all of the petitioners for general letters of administration requested that there be appointed a special administrator—and upon which particular reliance has been placed by the respondent as justifying the order sought to be reviewed in this proceeding—is quite immaterial, for the reason that the order which the court made and which the petitioner here is seeking to review expressly refers to another proceeding than an oral application for special letters of administration, to wit, to a formal proceeding in which a written application for letters of administration was filed, and that since no such written application for letters of administration was ever filed, and hence no such formal proceeding was before the court, the order of the court purporting to have been made in such formal proceeding must necessarily have been on the face of the record beyond the jurisdiction of the court. For that reason, and those appearing in the discussion of this matter before this court, the writ is granted, and the order sought to be reviewed is annulled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by John Tischhauser against A. S. Prentice, W. J. Bryant, and Lorenzo D. Swartwout. There was judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying their motion for new trial, defendants Bryant and Swartwout appeal. Order affirmed.

Johnstone Jones, Jacob A. Visel, and V. J. Cobb, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Len Claiborne and Ben Goodrich, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendants W. J. Bryant and Lorenzo D. Swartwout appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The judgment is founded upon a note for $623, payable to the plaintiff and signed by the defendants, Prentice, Bryant, and Swartwout. As stated by counsel for appellants, their chief contentions are that they signed the note and delivered the same to their co-obligor Prentice on a condition which was not performed; that the consideration for the note was illegal; and that their signatures were obtained by fraud exercised by defendant Prentice in procuring such signatures. At the trial appellants amended their answer, and thereby alleged that at the time of accepting the note the plaintiff had full knowledge of the circumstances attending their execution of the note, and knew that the defendants signed said note merely as sureties thereon, and agreed to deal with them in the capacity of sureties and not as principals. But it was admitted at the trial that the note was delivered to plaintiff without knowledge on his part that its delivery was contrary to any instructions given by appellants to Prentice, and their counsel state in their final brief that the law of suretyship and the fact that appellants were sureties "are almost foreign to this case."

[1] The facts are that prior to the execution of this note the defendant Prentice was in debt to plaintiff in the sum of $623, which is the principal sum named in the note. The plaintiff was pressing for payment, and at the same time a criminal action against Prentice was pending in the police court of the city of Los Angeles, under complaint charging Prentice with having obtained money by false pretenses, and the plaintiff, John Tischhauser, was the complaining witness in that action. Appellants by their answer in this action alleged that the note in suit was delivered to plaintiff and accepted by him in consideration of his desisting from further prosecution of Prentice on said criminal charge. There is some evidence in the record tending to support this defense, but there is also substantial evidence to the contrary, and the charge was flatly denied by the plaintiff. Therefore the court's finding of fact is conclusive, and appellants, in further urging illegality of consideration as a ground for sustaining their appeal, are contending in vain against established facts.

[2] The second defense contained in the answer of appellants was that they signed the note and gave the same to Prentice upon condition that he should obtain the signatures of Alec and Annie Odett to the note before delivering it to the plaintiff, and should not deliver the note unless those signatures were obtained, but that in fact the note was delivered in violation of the said condition. Appellants' theory is that the contract sued upon is incomplete, and not the obligation which they intended to make; that they as sureties intended to bind themselves jointly with two other sureties, the Odetts, but not otherwise, and that without those names it is not their note. The evidence shows that Prentice falsely stated to Bryant that the Odetts had promised to sign the note with him, and shows that Bryant signed with the understanding that the note was not to be used without those signatures; and it also appears that Swartwout in signing the note relied upon the fact that Bryant was his cosurety. The difficulty with this defense is that these facts were not made known to Tischhauser before he accepted the note. Prentice (called as a witness for the defendants) testified that he did not tell Mr. Tischhauser anything about the circumstances under which he had obtained the note from Bryant. In support of their contention that the surety was not liable because the delivery was on a condition which was not performed, appellants refer to Ayres v. Milroy, 53 Mo. 516, 14 Am. Rep. 465, and several other cases. Ayres v. Milroy contains language which apparently supports this contention, but we find that decision later discussed in State v. Potter, 63 Mo. 212, 21 Am. Rep. 440, and justified solely on the ground that Ayres was apprised of the condition on which the surety was to be bound. The decision in State v. Potter then proceeds with a discussion of numerous decisions, including a majority of those cited in appellants' brief herein, and shows that in a majority, if not all, of them there were circumstances sufficient to put the obligee upon notice of the incompleteness of the bond or note. The court then holds that where the surety who defends the action had invested the principal with an apparent authority to deliver the bond and there was nothing on the face of the bond or in any of the attending circumstances to apprise the obligee, who accepted it, that there was any secret agreement which should preclude the acceptance of the bond, the surety alone is at fault, and his liability will be enforced. The court declares that such a case furnishes an opportune application of the language of Lord Holt in Hern v. Nichols, 1 Salk. 289, that, "seeing somebody must be a loser by this deceit, it is more reason that he that employs and puts a trust and confidence in the deceiver should be a loser, than a stranger."

[3] The claim by appellants that their signatures were obtained by fraud practiced upon them by Prentice is subject to the same infirmity as their claim that the note was delivered upon a condition which was not performed. Knowledge of the facts was not brought home to the plaintiff. The note was received and accepted according to its form as a note executed by the defendants, and was delivered by one of the makers under apparently complete authority from all. By accepting the note plaintiff granted an extension of time for payment of a debt presently due, and that was a valuable and sufficient consideration.

As there are no errors in the rulings of the court or in the conduct of the trial which substantially affect the merits of this case, a new trial was properly refused.

The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by F. W. Hunt against Andrew Glassell. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to his second amended complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Murphey & Poplin, of Los Angeles, for appellant. J. E. Hannon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. By his original complaint in this action, filed on December 15, 1911, the plaintiff, as successor in right to Duquesne Brewing Company, a corporation, demanded judgment upon a certain promissory note for the sum of $10,000, dated September 25, 1907, and payable one year after date. On June 3, 1913, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint setting forth a note of same date and amount as before and in like terms, except that it read "ten months after date" instead of one year after date, and omitted the provision for interest contained in the note set out in the original complaint. A demurrer to the amended complaint having been sustained, the plaintiff, on the 31st day of July, 1913, filed his second amended complaint, and therein alleged the execution of a note in the same terms as the note set out in the first amended complaint. The second amended complaint states facts showing that at the time of commencement of this action the plaintiff was unable to see the note or obtain a copy thereof and was obliged to rely upon his recollection of its terms, plaintiff having seen the note at about the date it was made; alleging also that there was but one $10,000 note made by defendant to Duquesne Brewing Company of date September 25, 1907, and that the note sued on herein, as shown in the second amended complaint, is the same note sued on and by mistake incorrectly set out in the original complaint.

The second amended complaint further shows that during the year 1909 the Duquesne Brewing Company made and delivered to A. K. Martel a note for $2,500, which note was afterwards sold by Martel to Fidelity Investment Company, a corporation; that when the $2,500 note became due the Duquesne Brewing Company, in consideration of forbearance of the holder of that note, pledged to Fidelity Investment Company the Glassell note of $10,000 as collateral security for said Martel note; that on June 24, 1909, the Fidelity Investment Company commenced an action on the $10,000 note against Glassell and Duquesne Brewing Company, and Glassell as defendant in that action filed an answer and the case was set down for trial; that prior to any trial being had therein, and on or about May 10, 1910, "said defendant, Andrew Glassell, settled the said cause of action by then and there paying to said plaintiff in said action about the sum of $2,500"; that said payment was made as a payment on said $10,000 note and to settle and pay all claim and demand that Fidelity Investment Company had in or to said $10,000 note as security for the payment of said Martel note; that thereupon Fidelity Investment Company, plaintiff in that action, transferred and delivered to Andrew Glassell, defendant therein, both of said notes and ever since that time he has been in possession and control of the same; that Glassell at and prior to the time he made said settlement knew that said $10,000 note made by him to Duquesne Brewing Company was held as collateral security for the Martel note and for no other purpose; and well knew that the only interest that Fidelity Investment Company had in the $10,000 note was to the extent of $2,500, with interest on said smaller sum; that the defendant Glassell received said note in trust for the Duquesne Brewing Company and has held the same in trust for the use and benefit of the Duquesne Brewing Company and its assigns ever since that time.

On October 5, 1909, Duquesne Brewing Company was adjudged a bankrupt. Thereafter, after proceedings duly had as recited in the second amended complaint herein, the trustee in bankruptcy of the said bankrupt's estate, duly authorized therefor, sold at public auction certain assets of the estate, including said $10,000 note and the plaintiff, F. W. Hunt, became the purchaser thereof. That the sale having been duly approved and confirmed, the trustee assigned and transferred to plaintiff all right, title, and interest of the estate of Duquesne Brewing Company in and to said note. The plaintiff has demanded from defendant that defendant surrender possession to him of the note, and also has demanded payment of said note by defendant to the plaintiff, all of which has been refused.

The defendant demurred to the second amended complaint upon the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant, and upon the further ground that the cause of action as shown upon the face of the complaint appears to be barred by the provisions of section 337, Code of Civil Procedure. That demurrer having been sustained, judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and this appeal is by the plaintiff from that judgment. The appeal is presented upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

[1] If the cause of action stated in the present complaint is a new and totally different cause of action from that stated in the original complaint, the amendment does not relate back to the beginning of the action so as to stop the running of the statute of limitations. Lambert v. McKenzie, 135 Cal. 100, 67 Pac. 6, is one of many decisions declaring the rule. But if the amendment be one which merely corrects a defective or erroneous pleading of the same cause of action, the amendment will relate back to the filing of the original complaint. Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 49, 27 Pac. 40; Union Lumber Co. v. J. W. Schouten & Co., 25 Cal. App. 80, 142 Pac. 910. The facts contained in the present record, and which in substance we have stated, are sufficient to show that in this action the plaintiff at all times has been seeking to recover judgment upon one and the same note, and that there has been no change in identity of the subject-matter constituting his cause of action. It follows that the second amended complaint was not subject to demurrer under the claim that it was barred by limitations.

[2] Appellant claims that according to the allegations of his complaint it is shown that the defendant, well knowing that Fidelity Investment Company held the Glassell note in its possession solely as a pledge securing the smaller note which we have called the Martel note, obtained possession of both notes by paying to the pledgee an amount not more than sufficient to satisfy the pledgee's interest therein; the amount so paid being only a fractional part of the indebtedness due from him to the pledgor of the larger note. If the settlement so made by Glassell was with the pledgee and under the circumstances to which we have referred, it must be that a balance remains due and unsatisfied on the Glassell note and that such balance is due to the plaintiff as successor to Duquesne Brewing Company. The pledged note was not properly subject to sale by the pledgee; he had only the right to collect it when due. Civ. Code, § 3006. Under the circumstances here appearing, no transaction could take place between Glassell and the pledgee which would put Glassell into any better position with respect to the pledged note than that of Fidelity Investment Company which held it in pledge. The general property in the note still remained in the payee, Duquesne Brewing Company. Cross v. Eureka Lake, etc., Canal Co., 73 Cal. 302, 306, 14 Pac. 885, 2 Am. St. Rep. 808; Cushing v. Building Association, 165 Cal. 731, 737, 134 Pac. 324.

[3] In support of his claim that the second amended complaint does not state a cause of action, respondent's counsel argues that the demurrer should be sustained because it is shown that the action commenced by Fidelity Investment Company was against the pledgor, Duquesne Brewing Company, as well as against Glassell; and that since it is alleged that after the answer had been filed by Glassell the defendant "settled the said cause of action by then and there paying to said plaintiff in said action about the sum of $2,500," this is sufficient to raise the inference that the settlement was made with the pledgor as well as with the pledgee, and that the pledgor consented to the surrender of the note.

On examining the complaint we find it further alleged that the payment by Glassell was made as a payment on the Duquesne Brewing Company's note and to settle and pay all claim and demand that the pledgee had therein as security for the payment of the Martel note. It is not made to appear that Duquesne Brewing Company had appeared in the action or in any manner participated in the settlement. Indeed, the settlement was made after the adjudication of bankruptcy. The court should not by a strained construction attempt to supply the allegation of a fact not stated in a complaint in order to hold that the complaint does not state a cause of action. Assuming that we might give full effect to the rule supported by authorities cited by respondent, that a compromise made with the consent of the pledgor is binding upon him, and therefore upon subsequent assignees of the pledgor, we think that such rule is not properly applicable to the complaint now under consideration.

We are of the opinion that the demurrer to the second amended complaint in this action should be overruled, and for that reason the judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to proceed accordingly.

PEOPLE v. COLLIS. (Cr. 344.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 5, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 3, 1916.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 300 — ARRAIGNMENT — PLEA OF NOT GUILTY — EFFECT.

The plea of "not guilty" to a criminal charge admits of any defense which the facts justify except former jeopardy, acquittal, or conviction, so that defendant, to avail himself of intoxicated condition at time of offense, need not specially plead it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 684-686; Dec. Dig. — 300.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 814(10) — INSTRUCTIONS — INTOXICATION.

Where defendant himself brought out the fact of his intoxication at the time of the offense, instructions as to effect of intoxication on responsibility for the crime are applicable, regardless of the motive with which such fact was shown.

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 761(12) — INSTRUCTIONS — INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

Instructions that the jury might consider that accused was intoxicated at the time in determining the purpose with which he committed the act, and that when a crime is committed by one in a fit of intoxication he cannot avail himself of his own vice, are not objectionable as invading the province of the jury by assuming that accused committed the crime, but are a mere abstract statement of principle, especially where the jury was instructed that it was exclusive judge of credibility of witnesses and probative value of testimony, and that the defendant was presumed to be innocent, and that they must be convinced of his guilt to a moral certainty before they could convict.

4. CRIMINAL LAW ☞ 761(12)—INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

Although the only evidence connecting accused with the homicide tended to show that it was deliberate, wanton, and without provocation, where there was evidence that he was intoxicated at the time, verdict of guilty of manslaughter did not show the connecting evidence to have been disregarded, so as to indicate error in instructions, attacked as assuming that accused committed the homicide.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Henry Nan Collis was convicted of manslaughter and from the judgment and order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Wall, of Mariposa, L. J. Schino, of Merced, and B. S. Wilson, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of manslaughter under an information charging him with the crime of murder, and appeals to this court from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial.

The homicide occurred at a mining camp in Hunter's Valley, Mariposa county, on the 5th day of November, 1915. The victim of the tragedy, Thomas B. Lynn, and one William Thornton, a resident of Chowchilla, Madera county, were the joint owners of certain mines located in Hunter's Valley. The defendant was employed by them at said mines, and worked for them on a percentage basis. Thornton had not been at the mining camp for some five weeks prior to the date of the homicide, he having been ill during that period at his home in Chowchilla. On the 4th day of November, however, he put in an appearance at the camp. He, the defendant and the deceased were the only persons present at the time of the shooting. Thornton claimed to have seen the defendant shoot Lynn, and from his testimony, as given at the trial on behalf of the people, the following facts relative to the homicide are gleaned:

Upon arriving at the camp on the morning of the 4th of November, Thornton observed that Lynn and the defendant had been drinking heavily. He further discovered that there were not sufficient provisions in the house for their then present purposes, and thereupon proposed to the defendant that they (defendant and himself) go to Pleasant Valley and Jasper Point, in said county, and at those places purchase groceries and such other articles as were then needed at the camp. The defendant agreed to this, and the two accordingly left the camp together for the places above named, one carrying a rifle and the other a shotgun with which they might kill any game which they might run across. On the way to those points the defendant told the witness of trouble he had had with the deceased. He said to Thornton that the deceased had annoyed him greatly in his (deceased's) talk on socialism, with which subject the latter appears to have been obsessed, and that he (defendant) "thought two or three times that he would have to kill him." The two finally arrived at Pleasant Valley, and Thornton, having purchased some supplies, which included four quart bottles of whisky, started on his return to the camp, accompanied by the defendant. Upon their arrival at the camp, they and the deceased and one James Young, who had called at the camp, proceeded to drink the liquor, with the result that all of them became more or less intoxicated, the defendant getting so drunk that by 12 or 1 o'clock he was required to take to his bed. Thornton, however, had previously gone to bed, and testified that, while in bed, and before the defendant had retired, he heard a heated argument going on between the latter and the deceased.

On the 5th day of November, the deceased arose quite early and went to Jasper Point, a distance of three miles from the camp, for the purpose of getting mail. He returned at about 8 o'clock in the morning, but later in the day again went to Jasper. In the meantime, the defendant remained at the camp and in his bed, being greatly under the influence of liquor.

The deceased returned to the camp from his second trip to Jasper at between the hours of 5 and 6 p. m. At this time, Thornton was sitting on a chair on the outside of the house and about 15 feet to the left of the front door of the house. The defendant, with no other clothing on but his shirt, suddenly appeared at the door and inquired, "Where is Lynn?" to which Thornton replied, "There he comes from Jasper," whereupon the defendant exclaimed, "I am going to shoot him." Immediately following the threat the defendant raised and aimed a gun at Lynn and fired. Lynn made a loud exclamation, and said to the defendant: "Happy, Happy [the defendant was familiarly known as and called "Happy"] don't shoot no more; you have hit me." Thornton sprang from his chair, and said, addressing the defendant, "What do you mean, Happy?" to which the latter rejoined, addressing Thornton, "You s—n of a b—h, I will shoot you." The defendant, who was still at the door and a little inside the house, then brought his weapon around as if to fire another shot. Thornton started to get out of range, and had taken only a few steps when the gun was again discharged. "I would like to say that before that," testified Thornton, "I heard the shell hit the floor inside the house, so I knew the gun was loaded, so I beat it. I do not suppose I got over 60 yards until the gun went off the third time. I did not stop any more. I did not see any more than the first shot. The second and third shots I did not see. * * * I fell just as it went off the third time. I kept on. I thought I would go and have him arrested. I heard a voice singing over on the road. I went across the mountain and kept hollering for him, and he did not answer me." Upon reaching the road, Thornton met a gentleman named Williams, to whom he imparted information of the shooting, and requested him to go to a store near by and telephone for the sheriff or constable. The constable at Hornitos, in said county, was finally reached and apprised of the shooting, and, accompanied by two or three other persons, immediately started for the scene of the shooting, arriving there late at night. They found the dead body of the deceased lying on the ground a short distance from the point where he stood when shot, there being physical evidence that the body had been dragged from the one point to the other.

After their arrival at the camp and before the defendant was aware of their presence there, the constable and his party saw the defendant leave the house and go to the spot where lay the body of Lynn, and, by the aid of a lighted match or a light otherwise produced, apparently view or look at the body. He was heard at this time to say, speaking to a dog which was with him and barking: "Show me, show me Thornton. I am going to kill the s—n of a b—h." The defendant was later arrested and positively denied, as he did at the trial, shooting Lynn or knowing by whom he was shot.

An inquest held by the coroner of the county into the cause of the death of Lynn developed that death had been produced by gunshot wounds. One of the bullets "entered the right chest 6½ inches from the shoulder, 2½ inches from the center of the chest, and came out 10 inches from the top of the left shoulder, and 5 inches to the left of the spinal column, the center of the back." Another bullet entered the left thigh 10 inches from the center of the knee cap and came out 2 inches below where it entered.

There is, as will later be perceived, no just ground for a serious claim that the verdict is devoid of sufficient support. Indeed, since the evidence upon its face is by no means improbable, there exists no ground for the support of such a claim.

The theory of the defense at the trial was that Thornton and not the defendant committed the crime. There was an attempt at sustaining that theory, and, it may be added, a few circumstances presented which might well be regarded as tending to support it. But the jury did not accept that theory, evidently being convinced that Thornton's version of the homicide was true. The verdict, upon the record as presented before us, is final and conclusive upon this court.

[1, 2] It is claimed, however, that the court committed prejudicial error by the giving of the following instructions:

"No act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in that condition, but, whenever the actual existence of any particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of time, the jury may take into consideration the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time, in determining the purpose, motive or intent with which he committed the act."

"It is a well-settled rule that drunkenness is no excuse for crime. Insanity produced by intoxication does not destroy responsibility when the party, when sane and responsible, made himself voluntarily intoxicated; and drunkenness forms no defense whatever to the fact of guilt, for when a crime is committed by a party while in a fit of intoxication, the law will not allow him to avail himself of his own gross vice and misconduct to shelter himself from the legal consequences of such crime. Such evidence can only be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining the degree of crime, and for that purpose it must be received with great caution."

The above instructions were based upon, and the first substantially in, the language of section 22 of the Penal Code.

It is contended: (1) That instructions upon intoxication are wholly inapplicable to this case, since (so it is claimed) the defendant's condition for sobriety or inebriety on the occasion and at the time of the shooting was only incidentally brought into the case, and not for the purpose of mitigating the offense or reducing the crime to the lesser degree or grade thereof or of acquitting the accused; (2) that the instructions trespassed upon the domain of fact, in that they in effect declared that the defendant committed the act of killing the deceased. The objections thus urged against the instructions are untenable.

The argument in support of the first of the propositions above stated appears to be based upon the theory that the plea of "not guilty" interposed by the defendant to the information limited the defense to the sole question whether the defendant actually committed the act of destroying the life of Lynn, and that, to have warranted proof of the intoxicated condition of the defendant, at the time of the homicide, it was necessary to set that fact up by way of a special plea. This, we say, seems to be the theory of the argument, or, at any rate, is the necessary effect thereof. Of course, there is absolutely no basis in law for any such notion. The plea of "not guilty" to a criminal charge admits of any defense which the facts justify, except those of once in jeopardy and former acquittal or conviction. Self-defense, the plea of insanity or the plea that the accused was not guilty of any connection whatever with the commission of the crime may be introduced under the general plea of "not guilty."

That the instructions were applicable to the case at bar, we think the record clearly and unquestionably shows. Counsel for the defendant themselves brought out the fact of the defendant's intoxicated condition on the occasion and at the time of the homicide. They brought out that fact, not only by and through the defendant himself, by questions directly propounded to him and addressed to that subject, but also by and through the witness Young, who testified on behalf of the defendant. What their special motive or purpose was in proving the fact it is not material to inquire or necessary to ascertain. The fact remains that they did introduce proof that the defendant was greatly under the influence of intoxicating liquor at the time of the homicide, and therefore the instructions complained of and the principle therein announced were peculiarly applicable to the case and most properly given to the jury.

[3] The second ground of objection to the instructions arises from the language thereof which we have put in italics. By that language, it is claimed, as above stated, that the court invaded the function committed by the Constitution exclusively to the jury, in that it involved an instruction upon a question of fact, and virtually said to the jury that the defendant committed the crime charged in the information. But the instructions are not reasonably susceptible of the construction so given them, and are therefore not obnoxious to the objection to which they would be amenable were that construction maintainable.

The instructions, as only a cursory examination of them will readily attest, merely involve a statement in abstract form or in a general way of the rule as to the drunkenness of one charged with the commission of a crime at the time of the commission thereof, as it is laid down by section 22 of the Penal Code, supra. They, in other words, only abstractly declare what the rule of law is upon the satisfactory proof of facts of an indicated nature. Nowhere therein is it declared that the facts to which the instructions would be pertinent were proved, nor do they directly refer to the accused or intimate that he committed the crime charged.

Instructions based upon said section of the Penal Code have often been given in language substantially, if not precisely, the same as that in which the challenged instructions are framed, and have been uniformly approved by the higher courts. Indeed, we are not able to perceive how the rule could be stated intelligently in materially different language. Nor can we understand how the jury, in view of the other instructions read to them, could have obtained such a conception of the meaning of the instructions as counsel's construction of them would give to them. The jury must be assumed to have been composed of men of good common sense, and that they must have fully and clearly understood the duty resting upon them from the instructions which, in plain and unmistakable language, told them that they were the sole and exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses and the effect and probative value of the testimony, that a defendant was at all times and until a verdict was reached to be presumed to be guiltless of the crime charged or of any crime, or degree of crime, therein involved, and that a verdict of conviction would be justified only after they were convinced from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt. Surely, with the law as thus stated before them, the jury could not have understood the instructions on intoxication as involving a statement by the court that the defendant had committed the crime charged or the act of slaying the deceased.

[4] Counsel say that the verdict demonstrates that Thornton's testimony was discredited and, indeed, wholly disregarded by the jury, and that therefore the defendant probably would not have been convicted but for the instructions given. The argument is that Thornton's was the only testimony presented in the case tending in the slightest measure to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime; that it showed the killing to have been deliberate, wanton, and without cause or provocation; that, if true and believed, the testimony warranted no other verdict than that of murder of the first degree. The argument, in its application to the instant case, is wholly destitute of force or merit. As shown, there was evidence of the intoxicated condition of the accused at the time the homicide was committed. The jury could therefore have consistently believed the story of Thornton in its entirety, and at the same time, under the instructions complained of here and the evidence addressed to the intoxicated condition of the defendant, have justly concluded that the verdict reached and returned by them was the proper one. Indeed, inasmuch as there was no other evidence than Thornton's testimony tending in any degree whatever to establish the defendant's guilt, we may properly assume that the jury believed Thornton, and would have found the accused guilty of one of the degrees of the higher offense but for the instructions here challenged.

There are no other points presented in the case.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Frank H. Poor against W. P. Fuller & Co. From an adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for appellant. John D. Willard, John W. Coleberd, and Gilbert D. Ferrell, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, in an action for personal injuries.

The injuries to plaintiff for which damages are sought to be recovered were caused, it is alleged, by his being, through the negligence of the defendant, hit on the back of the left hand by a large box falling from a wooden chute which ran from the second to the first floor of defendant's warehouse, while the plaintiff was standing at the foot of the chute catching boxes as they descended thereon. The complaint is in two counts. The theory of the first count is that the wooden chute described in the complaint was an unsafe and insecure appliance with which to do the work to which plaintiff was assigned. It is alleged that the defendant negligently and without due or any care for the safety of the plaintiff did place and maintain a certain wooden chute in an unsafe and insecure position dangerous to the life, body, and limbs of plaintiff, in failing to secure or fasten in any manner the chute to any thing or object, or to make it stable or stationary in its position; that the defendant caused another of its employes, one Bergmann, to work on the second floor of said warehouse at the upper end of said chute, and there to place heavy wooden boxes in and upon said chute, and send said boxes rapidly down said chute to the first floor of said warehouse toward the place where plaintiff was working, which said Bergmann carelessly and negligently and without due or any care for the safety of plaintiff then and there did; that plaintiff was, while so employed by defendant, negligently and without any care for the safety of plaintiff, ordered and directed to take a place and position near the lower end of said chute, and there to work and receive and remove from said chute the heavy wood boxes sent down said chute, which said plaintiff then and there proceeded to do. Then the complaint alleges that while one of said boxes was descending, the chute shifted from its position, and caused the box to be deflected from the chute in such a way that it fell upon and struck with great force the hand of the plaintiff, inflicting the injuries upon and damaging the plaintiff in the manner and in the sum set forth and demanded in the complaint.

The second count of the complaint sets forth by reference all the allegations of the first count, and adds an allegation to the effect that while the box was sliding down the chute and after the chute had slipped from its position said Bergmann took hold of and moved the chute, thereby causing the said box to suddenly change the course of its motion and to be diverted and deflected from the chute in such a way that it fell upon the plaintiff and caused the injuries complained of.

[1] There is no merit in the defendant's first point that the general demurrer to the first count should have been sustained for the reason that the complaint does not allege "directly or by implication that the defendant, the employer, knew or ought to have known of the alleged defects." The complaint, as we have seen, alleges that the defendant negligently and carelessly and without due care directed the plaintiff to work at a place or with an appliance which was not safe. The defendant could not have been negligent or careless in the respects indicated in the complaint, unless it knew, or with the exercise of reasonable diligence should have known, of the defects of the place assigned to the plaintiff to work. Hence it follows that the complaint, at least by implication, alleges that the defendant had knowledge of the dangerous character of the place in which the plaintiff was directed to work.

In the case of Indianapolis Southern R. Co. v. Wall, 54 Ind. App. 43, 101 N. E. 680, 4 N. C. C. A. 532, it is held that:

In an action to recover for injuries alleged to have been received through defendant's negligence in suddenly starting its train as plaintiff was boarding it, it is not necessary that the complaint allege that defendant failed to stop its train a reasonable length of time to permit plaintiff to board it safely, nor that defendant knew that plaintiff was attempting to board its train when it started it. The allegation that the train was negligently started while plaintiff was boarding is sufficient, and will permit of proof of the reasonableness of the length of the stop, and of defendant's knowledge that plaintiff was attempting to board the train and that defendant negligently started the train while he was attempting to board it.

See, also, Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Hines, 132 Ill. 161, 23 N. E. 1021, 22 Am. St. Rep. 515; Leland v. Chehalis Lumber Co., 68 Wash. 632, 123 Pac. 1086; Smith v. Central Lumber & Mill Co., 104 Cal. 532, 33 Pac. 411.

[2] Referring to the second point, apparently it was the theory of the plaintiff, as disclosed in this count, that the injury may have been caused by the act of Bergmann in moving the chute after it had shifted from its original position and while the box which hit plaintiff's hand was descending the chute; but it is not alleged that that act of Berg-mann was negligently done, and for that reason the defendant asserts that the second count fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that therefore the general demurrer thereto should have been sustained.

We think not. If this count was based solely on the alleged act of Bergmann in moving the chute, it may be that this count of the complaint would be deficient in the respect claimed; but as we have seen, this count embraces all the allegations of the first, the allegations of which as to negligence we have already set forth. Hence it is clear that the second count as a whole upon at least one ground states sufficient facts, and was proof against the general demurrer. Hough v. Grant's Pass Power Co., 41 Or. 531, 69 Pac. 655; Jones v. Iverson, 131 Cal. 101, 63 Pac. 135.

[3] Over the objection of the defendant the plaintiff was permitted to answer the question: "What, in your opinion, caused the box to fly off the chute and fall * * * on July 1, 1912?" The question doubtless called for the opinion of the witness, but it was not objected to upon that ground, nor did the witness in answering it give his opinion, but testified to a fact, for he replied, "The chute slipped and the box fell onto the step." The next question also called for an opinion, and it was objected to on that ground. The question was: "What caused the chute to slip and shift on that occasion?" And the witness answered, "The dropping of the cases on to the chute." If it appeared from this answer that the shifting of the chute came about from the manner in which the boxes were dropped into it, it might perhaps be said that an error of some little prejudice to the defendant had been committed; but the answer does not carry with it any such implication; and the answer to the next question makes it clear that the witness' idea was that the accident was not caused in that way, for he speaks of the box that hit him as having been placed or laid upon the chute, and not as having been violently thrown thereupon. His theory was, as shown by his examination, in response to a question free from objection, that the chute was in bad condition, and that the box which struck him, while rapidly descending, caused the chute to slip, and was precipitated therefrom.

[4] No error was committed by the court in permitting the plaintiff to describe the immediate surroundings of the place where he was put to work. Such evidence we think was admissible under a liberal construction of the issues framed by the pleadings; and it appears that the defendant must have so understood the pleading according to some of the instructions to the jury proposed by it.

[5] The plaintiff was also allowed over objection to testify that on a prior occasion the chute had shifted, and that about 15 minutes after the accident he observed the legs of the chute to be in bad condition. Questions eliciting this testimony were objected to, but it is clear that evidence of the condition of the place where plaintiff was injured within a reasonable time before or after the accident is admissible for the purpose of showing its condition at the time of the injury. 29 Cyc. 607, 614.

[6] The court gave a number of instructions at the request of the plaintiff to the effect that it was the duty of the employer to furnish his employes with a reasonably safe place to work, and with reasonably suitable and safe structures and appliances with which to do the assigned work. As before intimated, we think that under the allegations of the complaint and under the evidence introduced, such instructions were properly given; and this is tacitly at least conceded by two instructions given at the request of the defendant. Upon the latter's request the court upon this subject also gave the following instruction:

"Under the pleadings in this case you cannot base your verdict in any degree upon any claim of plaintiff that the place in which he was working was unsafe or improper."

This instruction was erroneous, and was in conflict with other instructions on the same subject; but as it was given at the request of the defendant and was more favorable to it than it was entitled to have given, it would seem to follow that the defendant has no good ground of complaint. Dennison v. Chapman, 105 Cal. 447, 39 Pac. 61; McNamara v. MacDonough, 102 Cal. 575, 36 Pac. 941; People v. Hower, 151 Cal. 638, 91 Pac. 507.

[7] The court refused to give the following instruction:

"You are instructed that if you consider that any witness has been false in any part of his testimony, that witness is to be distrusted in the remainder of his testimony."

While this proposed instruction conforms to the language of subdivision 3 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, still it is not, as has been held, a complete exposition of the law, and to be understood it requires construction and amplification. It omits two essential elements, viz., the willfulness of the false testimony given and its materiality. In People v. Plyler, 121 Cal. 160, at page 163, 53 Pac. 553, at page 554, the court say:

"Defendant proposed the following instruction: 'If any witness examined before you has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, it is your duty to distrust his entire evidence.' This instruction was modified by the court and thus given: 'A witness who has willfully sworn falsely in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others.' As given, this instruction closely approximates to the language of subdivision 3 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The subdivision is but a brief paraphrase of the terms maxim, 'Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus.' The Code provision, like the Latin maxim, is not a complete exposition of the law. Well understood by jurists, it would be misleading to the nonprofessional mind. It requires construction and amplification. This it has received. People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 491, 494; People v. Soto, 59 Cal. 368. The proposed instruction is an accurate exposition of its meaning, and should have been given. The charge delivered by the court omits the very important element that the willful false testimony must be upon a material matter."

[8] Moreover, it is settled law that the giving or refusing to give this instruction, unless injury is shown, does not constitute prejudicial error. People v. Russell, 19 Cal. App. 750, 127 Pac. 829; Medlin v. Spazier, 23 Cal. App. 242, 245, 137 Pac. 1078. In the last case, speaking of a similar proposed instruction, the court said:

"Such instruction, however, belongs to that class of instructions which are said to pertain to mere commonplace matters that jurors are presumed to know about and act upon in the absence of being instructed thereon. Hence, if not prejudicial to defendant's case, neither the giving nor refusal of them will be held to be a ground for reversal."

There are other assigned errors; but a careful examination of the record discloses that appellant's contentions with respect to them are without substantial merit, and that the case was fairly tried.

Judgment and order affirmed.

STEINBRONER v. STEINBRONER.

(Civ. 1459.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 7, 1916.)

DIVORCE — §327—OPERATION—FOREIGN DIVORCE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A divorce decree of a foreign state may be collaterally attacked upon the ground that the court lacked jurisdiction because the plaintiff was not then residing within the foreign state, notwithstanding the necessary jurisdictional facts are recited in the record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 831-834; Dec. Dig. §327.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Divorce suit by Catherine Steinbroner against George P. Steinbroner. From a decree for plaintiff, and order granting plaintiff alimony pendente lite, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John Munro and Fay R. Robertson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Joseph Scott and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action for divorce. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order of court granting plaintiff alimony pendente lite, defendant appeals.

As disclosed by the record and argument in appellant's brief, the only ground upon which he based his defense to the action was a decree of the court of common pleas of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, together with an exemplified copy of the record therein, all of which were duly presented at the trial, showing that at a time antedating the commencement of this action, the bonds of matrimony theretofore contracted between plaintiff and defendant, as alleged herein, had been dissolved and a divorce granted him from said plaintiff by said decree so rendered by the common pleas court of Crawford county, Pa.

As to this defense, however, the court found that, under the laws of Pennsylvania, existing at the time, it was necessary in order to vest the court with jurisdiction to entertain an action for divorce, that the applicant therefor be at the time of commencing the suit a bona fide resident of such state, as well as such resident for a period of one year immediately preceding the bringing of such action; that defendant herein, who was plaintiff in the action so instituted in the Pennsylvania court, was at the time of the institution thereof, and for more than a year immediately preceding its commencement had been, a resident of the state of California, in which state defendant also resided. No attack is made upon this finding; indeed, we understand the facts so found to be conceded by appellant. As a conclusion of law, the court found that the decree so rendered and entered by the common pleas court of Pennsylvania, granting defendant a decree of divorce from plaintiff, was null and void for want of jurisdiction.

Appellant's sole contention is that, since the judgment rendered by the court of common pleas was regular on its face, it was not subject to collateral attack. In support of this claim he cites numerous authorities to the effect that:

"A divorce by a court having jurisdiction, valid and conclusive in state where rendered, is conclusive everywhere, and a finding of residence by the state court is prima facie proof and sufficient until overcome to support the jurisdiction." Cheever v. Wilson, 9 Wall. 123, 19 L. Ed. 604.

Undoubtedly this is true, provided the court has, as stated in the text, jurisdiction; but that is the very question here involved and as to which, as said, the decree presented is "prima facie proof and sufficient until overcome to support the jurisdiction." Since the evidence is not brought up, we must assume that it was ample to support the finding made by the court that there was a want of jurisdiction in the court rendering the decree, and this overcomes the prima facie showing made by its presentation. Mr. Black, in his work on Judgments, § 822, says:

"In America it is generally held, and indeed almost universally, that as a proceeding in divorce is intended to affect the status of the parties, and is therefore essentially in rem, the judgment pronounced, whether in a foreign country or in a sister state, by a court having lawful jurisdiction of the cause, and in the absence of fraud, is valid and binding everywhere and in all subsequent controversies, provided the applicant was bona fide domiciled within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, although the other party, being a nonresident, was notified only by advertisement or some other species of constructive service [italics are ours]"

—the theory being that the marriage relation is a status transitory in its nature and attached to the person of each of the contracting parties, so that a court having jurisdiction over the one may dissolve it as to both, notwithstanding the other is beyond such jurisdiction. In Dunham v. Dunham, 162 Ill. 589, 44 N. E. 841, 35 L. R. A. 70, quoting from the syllabus, it is said:

"An action for divorce is to some extent a proceeding in rem, and, where jurisdiction over the person of the defendant is not obtained, a court can deal with such status only by the fact that the plaintiff is in good faith domiciled within its territory, and thereby entitled to invoke this jurisdiction."

And, further:

"A decree of divorce, when pleaded in a court of another state, may be attacked for want of jurisdiction in the court which rendered it, and where the action in which it was rendered was ex parte, and it is clearly proven that the plaintiff was not at the time a bona fide resident of the state in which it was brought, such decree will be held void."

The case of Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. Ed. 897, is authority for the statement that the jurisdiction of a court of a foreign state to render a judgment is always open to collateral attack in a proceeding in another state, and that:

"The record of a judgment rendered in another state may be contradicted as to the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction."

To the same effect is Hall v. Lanning, 91 U. S. 160, 23 L. Ed. 271, where it is said:

"The jurisdiction of a foreign court over the person or the subject-matter embraced in the judgment or decree of such court is always open to inquiry; and that, in this respect, the court of another state is to be regarded as a foreign court. * * * The record of such a judgment does not estop the parties from demanding such an inquiry."

In the case of In re James, 99 Cal. 374, 33 Pac. 1122, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60, the Supreme Court, in discussing the question, says:

"We agree with appellant that it is competent to collaterally impeach the record of a judgment rendered in another state by extrinsic evidence showing that the facts necessary to give the court pronouncing it jurisdiction to proceed, did not exist; and this is true although the record sought to be impeached may recite the existence of such jurisdictional facts."

Appellant has cited numerous authorities holding that a domestic judgment cannot be attacked collaterally in the courts of the state rendering the judgment; and also authorities like the text cited from Cheever v. Wilson, supra, to the effect that where the court having jurisdiction renders a valid and conclusive judgment, its action is conclusive everywhere. But these authorities have no bearing upon the question here presented. Both plaintiff and defendant were residents of this state at the time when and for more than one year immediately prior to defendant instituting the suit in Pennsylvania, wherein he obtained the judgment interposed as a bar to plaintiff's action. As the status which he sought to have destroyed attached to the person of the contracting parties, neither of whom was within the jurisdiction of the Pennsylvania court, it must follow that such court had no jurisdiction of either the person of the litigants or of the subject-matter of the action; and hence the purported decree interposed as a bar to this plaintiff's action was a nullity.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE $\S$ 114(1) — COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

In suit for specific performance of contract for lease of land, complaint showing that the party bound to give a lease had contracted to sell to another, who was in possession adverse to plaintiff, is not demurrable as indefinite, though it does not set out the contract of sale.

3. PUBLIC LANDS $\S$ 110—FINAL RECEIPT—NECESSITY OF PATENT.

Issuance of receiver's final receipt constitutes a conveyance by the government of the equitable title to the land, and until issuance of patent the government merely holds legal title as trustee for the holder of the receipt, although in case of fraud, it might still refuse to issue patent.

4. PLEADING $\S$ 216(1)—DEMURRER—SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

On hearing on demurrer, nothing dehors the pleading itself can be considered, and the court cannot determine whether its allegations are true, nor does Code Civ. 5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE $\S$ 114(1)—PLEADING—DEMURRER—INTEREST OF PARTIES.

Complaint for specific performance of contract to lease land, which alleges that the obligor has made a contract for sale to another and put him in possession is not demurrable as showing no interest in the obligor, since it shows her to be still the legal owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Suit by W. W. Colm against Mary F. Francis and the West Virginia Oil Company. Judgment for defendant Francis on plaintiff's refusal to plead further after demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

T. N. Harvey, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Matthew S. Platz, and George E. Whitaker, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

HART, J. This is a suit for the specific performance of a certain contract for a lease, or, more accurately speaking, to compel the defendant Mary F. Francis to execute a lease of certain land to the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of a certain written agreement to be hereafter more specifically referred to.

The said defendant (respondent herein) demurred to the complaint on general and special grounds. The demurrer was sustained and, the plaintiff refusing or failing to amend, judgment was thereupon entered against him and in favor of the respondent. This appeal is brought here by the plaintiff from said judgment.

The case as made by the complaint is this: That one P. J. O'Brien and one F. P. Francis, both residents of Kern county, each claimed, adversely to the other, to be the owner and holder of the possessory title to certain government lands in Kern county, "under and by virtue of certain mineral locations and mesne conveyances of the same"; said lands being described in the complaint as the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 6, township 11 N. of range 23 W., San Bernardino meridian; that said O'Brien and Francis, on the 10th day of September, 1908, entered into a certain written agreement, which was filed for record in the office of the county recorder of Kern county on the 19th day of October, 1908, and which agreement, in substance, recited and covenanted as follows: That one Edward Fox was desirous and willing to exploit said northeast quarter and develop the mineral deposits supposed to be contained therein, consisting of crude petroleum, "for and in consideration of his receiving a deed of grant, bargain, and sale to the northeast and southwest quarters of said northeast quarter," in accordance with the terms of a certain agreement entered into between said P. J. O'Brien and said Edward Fox on the 26th day of July, 1908; that "whereas, it is deemed advisable and to the best interests of the parties hereto that an amicable adjustment be made of the conflicting claims of said parties to the lands in question and hereinabove described and that litigation be avoided." Then follows a covenant whereby Francis was to receive, from the land allotted to O'Brien in each of the quarter sections named, 35 acres, and was to have the first claim or selection of 35 acres in either the one or the other of said sections, and O'Brien was, after such selection by Francis, to have the right to exercise his selection of the 45 acres in the other quarter section, in each case the selection to embrace one solid piece or parcel of land; that, after the execution of the said agreement, and on the 16th day of November, 1908, the said Francis, as party of the first part, entered into an agreement in writing with the said Edward Fox, as party of the second part, which agreement was filed for record in the office of the county recorder of Kern county, on the 21st day of January, 1909. In said agreement, which is set out in the complaint in hæc verba, it was recited, covenanted, and agreed: "that, whereas, said O'Brien and Francis are owners as tenants in common of the said northeast quarter of said section 6, and that "development work for oil upon said land is now being carried on and performed by the party of the second part; that, upon the discovery of oil in paying quantities, by reason of said development work, patent proceedings are to be instituted by said Francis and O'Brien for the purpose of procuring a United States patent to the land hereinabove described"; that by the said agreement between Francis and O'Brien, there were to be conveyed to and vested in the former, "upon the consummation of the patent proceedings above referred to," 35 acres of said quarter section, that "it is not yet determined out of what particular portion of said northeast quarter of said section 6 the said 35 acres so to be conveyed to and vested in said Francis are to be taken or segregated"; that, "for and in consideration of the said development work, performed and to be performed by the said party of the second part upon and for the benefit of said northeast quarter of said section 6 hereinabove described and for other good and sufficient considerations moving from the party of the second part to the party of the first part, the party of the first part hereby agrees, that when said 35 acres of land so to be conveyed to and title vested in him as aforesaid, is segregated from the remaining portion of said northeast quarter of section 6, and conveyed to and vested in him, he will execute and deliver to said party of the second part an indenture of lease of said 35 acres of land, which said indenture of lease shall embody, among others, the following provisions, to wit: That the said party of the first part, as lessor, shall lease, demise, and let unto the said party of the second part, as lessee, the said 35 acres of land, being a portion of said northeast quarter of said section 6, hereinbefore referred to, together with the exclusive right to mine, dig, excavate, bore, and drill for and otherwise to collect, develop, and obtain petroleum oil, natural gas, naphtha, and other hydrocarbon and kindred substances, and also water, and the right to sever and remove said substances from said lands, also to construct, maintain, and use over and upon said land, roads, pipe lines, telephone lines, storage tanks, engines, machinery, and other structures."

Subsequent to the making of the foregoing agreement, the said F. P. Francis died, his estate was administered upon by his widow, Mary F. Francis, the respondent herein, and, by a decree of the superior court of the county of Kern, sitting in probate, made and entered on the 13th day of July, 1910, said estate, including the interest of her deceased husband in and to the agreement of September 10, 1908, between the said deceased and the said O'Brien, concerning the land described in the complaint, was distributed to the said Mary F. Francis.

It is further alleged that subsequent to the making of the agreement between the said Fox and the said Frank P. Francis, and after the death of the latter, the said Fox discovered crude petroleum in large and paying quantities in and upon the said northeast quarter of the said section 6; that upon the said discovery of crude petroleum oil, application for a United States patent to said northeast quarter was made by said P. J. O'Brien, "and after proceedings had and taken in the United States Land Office at Los Angeles, Cal., the receiver's final receipt on said application for a patent was duly issued to said P. J. O'Brien for said northeast quarter of section 6; that, at or about the time of the issuance of said receiver's final receipt above referred to, the said P. J. O'Brien conveyed to the said defendant Mary F. Francis, as successor in interest of the estate of the said F. P. Francis, deceased, in accordance with the terms of the agreement made by him with said Francis," 35.14 acres of the land described in the complaint, said 35 acres and fraction of an acre being specifically described in the complaint.

On the 2d day of July, 1909, the said Edward Fox by an instrument in writing transferred and assigned all his right, title, and interest in and to said agreement of November 16, 1908, between himself and the said Frank P. Francis, to one Lewis Hicks, the said transfer having been, on the 6th day of July, 1909, recorded in the office of the county recorder of Kern county; and, on the 28th day of June, 1912, Hicks, by an instrument in writing, transferred and conveyed the said agreement and all rights thereunder to the plaintiff and appellant herein.

It is charged that, after the estate of F. P. Francis, deceased, was distributed to the defendant Mary F. Francis, and subsequent to the issuance of the United States receiver's final receipt and the conveyance by the said P. J. O'Brien to said Mary F. Francis of the 35 acres of land above mentioned, "and notwithstanding the existence of said agreement of lease, which has never been canceled, vacated, or set aside, and of which agreement of lease the said defendant Mary F. Francis had actual as well as constructive knowledge at all times herein mentioned, the said defendant Mary F. Francis entered into a contract of sale with one E. S. Good, by which the said defendant Mary F. Francis agreed to sell to the said E. S. Good the above-mentioned and described land for the purpose of drilling and operating the same for the production of oil therefrom"; that, in accordance with said agreement to sell, the said defendant placed the said Good in possession of said land; that said Good has assigned and transferred all his title and interest in and to said agreement to sell to the defendant West Virginia Oil Company, which company "has at all times since said assignment been in the occupancy and possession of said described land and claiming some right, title, and interest in said land, but plaintiff alleges that the same is without right or merit and is subject and subordinate to plaintiff's rights in said lease and said described land."

The plaintiff states that, on or about the 26th day of September, 1912, he made a demand on the respondent for a lease of said 35 acres in accordance with the terms of the written agreement of November 16, 1908, but that she has ever since failed and refused and still fails and refuses to execute an agreement of lease to the plaintiff; that plaintiff has at all times since the assignment of the said agreement to him been ready and willing "and is now ready and willing to perform all of the terms and conditions of said lease to be by him performed as lessee."

[1] The statement of the alleged special grounds of demurrer, so far as the first specification is concerned, is wanting in clearness. While the first and second specifications declare that the complaint is ambiguous and unintelligible, and that the court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, they in fact involve objections to the complaint on general rather than special grounds. More explicitly speaking, the necessary legal effect of the demurrer in those particulars is that the complaint is insufficient in the statement of a cause of action because it discloses that the lease was to be executed only when the patent to the land described in the complaint was issued to O'Brien and after he had conveyed to Francis the particular 35 acres of land which their agreement of September 10, 1908, called for, and that it does not appear from the complaint that either a patent or the receiver's final receipt on the application of a patent to said land had been issued to O'Brien or to any other person, or that the land had been segregated and the parcel to which Francis was entitled conveyed to him by O'Brien in pursuance of the terms of said agreement.

The averment relative to the alleged contract by the defendant to sell the land to the said E. S. Good, as well as those relative to the alleged transfer of the said agreement to sell to the defendant West Virginia Oil Company are also challenged as being enveloped in ambiguity and characterized by unintelligibility. The complaint, in the particular referred to, is not amenable to the objection thus made. It is true that the agreement to sell was not set out in full in the complaint, as counsel for the respondent seem to think ought to have been done. But it was within the rights of the plaintiff to plead said contract in a manner consistent with the dictates of his own judgment, so long as he made it clearly to appear in his complaint that such a contract had been made and that under it claims were made to the property in question adverse to his alleged rights therein. And the complaint does clearly show that such a contract had been made, was still in existence, and that under it the West Virginia Oil Company claims an interest in the premises in dispute adversely to the plaintiff's claim of interest in said property under the contract for a lease.

[2,3] The most important points urged here, however, are that the complaint does not state a cause of action for the relief herein sought because it fails to disclose that the conditions upon which the lease was to be made and delivered to Fox or his assignees had taken place or been complied with and because further it fails to show an adequate consideration either for the contract for a lease or for the lease itself. It is further contended that the defendant Mary F. Francis is not a real party in interest. These contentions are without legal force, and the demurrer was therefore erroneously sustained.

The theory of the respondent is that, under the terms of the contract between Francis and Fox, the latter could acquire no right to the lease until a patent to the land in question had actually been issued by the government to O'Brien. But there is no language in the contract between Francis and Fox which requires that instrument to be construed to mean that, as a condition precedent to the execution of the lease or to the right of Fox to compel the execution of the lease, a patent must have actually been issued to and received by O'Brien to the lands described in the complaint. The contract itself makes no express reference to a patent. The language of the preamble to the contract, viz.: That the 35 acres were to be conveyed to and vested in said Francis "upon the consummation of the patent proceedings" does not say, nor do we believe it may reasonably be held to have been intended to say, that the actual issuance of a patent by the government should have taken place as a condition to the execution of the lease. Indeed, the "consummation of the patent proceedings" by the applicant could have gone no further than establishing his right to a patent—he could not himself, quite obviously, issue the patent. All that the contract called for, so far as concerned Fox's right to a lease from Francis, was that the latter should acquire title to the 35 acres of land selected by him, and that he did acquire a title to 35 acres of land, which were selected and segregated from the northeast quarter of section 6, and conveyed to the successor in interest to his estate, the complaint very clearly discloses. That pleading, as has been shown, alleges that, upon the discovery of crude petroleum oil on the northeast quarter of section 6, due proceedings were had in the United States Land Office for the acquirement of a patent to said land, and thereupon the receiver's final receipt entitling the applicant to a patent "was duly issued to the said P. J. O'Brien for said northeast quarter of said section 6," and that "at the time of the issuance of said receiver's final receipt" O'Brien conveyed to the respondent, as the successor in interest in the estate of her deceased husband 35 acres out of the said northeast quarter.

The issuance to O'Brien of the receiver's final receipt constituted a conveyance to him by the government of the equitable title to the land. Until the patent was issued, the government was, of course, the holder of the legal title, but it held it as a mere trustee for O'Brien and no longer had a proprietary or, indeed, any interest whatever in the land itself. The discharge of its trust lay in the mere ministerial act of its officers charged with that duty in issuing the patent—the mere evidence of O'Brien's ownership in fee of the land. O'Brien's title, so far as dominion over it was concerned, became complete when he received the final certificate of the receiver.

The foregoing views are sustained by the decisions of the courts as well as by the adjudications of the land department of the government.

In Barney v. Dolph, 97 U. S. 652, 656 (24 L. Ed. 1063), it is said:

"When the right to a patent once became vested in a settler under the law, it was equivalent, so far as the government was concerned, to a patent actually issued. * * * The execution and delivery of the patent after the right to it is complete are the mere ministerial acts of the officer charged with that duty."

In a case before the Interior Department (Aspen Consol. Gold Min. Co. v. Williams, 27 Land Dec. 16) Secretary Bliss said:

"Where an entry and final certificate are obtained by compliance with the public land laws the right of the entryman or purchaser to a patent is complete, and his right or title will not be impaired by any delay in issuing the patent, and that when issued the patent will relate back to the date of the entry or purchase and give effect thereto from that time."

See, also, Carroll v. Safford, 3 How. 441, 461, 11 L. Ed. 671; Witherspoon v. Duncan, 4 Wall. 210, 218, 220, 18 L. Ed. 339; Stark v. Starr, 6 Wall. 402, 418, 18 L. Ed. 925; Amador Medean Gold Min. Co. v. South Hill Gold Min. Co. (C. C.) 13 Sawyer, 523, 36 Fed. 668.

Again, in Harkrader v. Goldstein, 31 Land Dec. 93, Acting Secretary Ryan said:

"Having complied with all the terms and conditions necessary to obtaining title, and the officers of the government whose duty it was to act in the premises, in the first instance, having accepted his proof and issued final certificate of entry thereon, the townsit entryman, and those for whom he was trustee, had, upon the face of the record, acquired a vested interest in the land, and, under the law, had become prima facie the equitable owners thereof and entitled to a patent."

See, also, Kern Oil Co. v. Clarke, 30 Decs. Interior Department, 500; Skinner v. Fisher, 40 Id. 112; In re S. P. R. R. Co., 32 Id. 51, 64; Wirth v. Branson, 98 U. S. 118, 121, 25 L. Ed. 86; Simmons v. Wagner, 101 U. S. 260, 261, 25 L. Ed. 910.

It is true that the government has it within its power to refuse, for sufficient reasons—for instance, for fraud in the procurement of the final certificate—to issue a patent after the final certificate therefor has been issued, but, in the absence of a showing that some reason exists for the withholding of or refusal to issue a patent, it cannot be assumed that the government has the legal right to do so, nor that, a final certificate for the land having been issued, the issuance of the patent will not follow in due course.

Thus it will be observed that O'Brien, having acquired an equitable title to the northeast quarter of section 6, conveyed to Mrs. Francis, as the successor in interest to her deceased husband, a similar title to 35 acres carved out of said quarter section, in accordance with the terms of the contract between O'Brien and her husband. The contract between Francis and Fox does not call for any particular kind of title—that is, it does not provide, as one of the conditions upon which Fox would be entitled to a lease of Francis' 35 acres, that the latter should first have vested in him a legal title to the land. It merely provides that title to the land shall be vested in him—a title which, whether legal or equitable, or both, would vest in him full dominion over the land so conveyed, with the power and right to dispose of it as he pleased. And, as by the receiver's final certificate and O'Brien's conveyance, such a title was vested in Francis or in his successor in interest, it follows, of course, that one of the several conditions upon which Fox was entitled to the lease under his contract with Francis had been complied with.

The construction thus given the contract for a lease harmonizes with the practical construction to which the parties themselves subjected the contract between O'Brien and Francis. Upon the issuance of the receiver's final receipt to O'Brien, Mrs. Francis, in the exercise of her right under said contract to a first selection of 35 acres out of the northeast quarter, selected and had set off to her said 35 acres and O'Brien conveyed the same to her and she accepted the conveyance—all this, in pursuance of said contract between O'Brien and Francis, the language of which, so far as that particular part of it was concerned, was followed by the contract for the lease.

[4] Counsel for the respondent have filed with the papers in this case (not contained in the transcript on appeal) a certified statement by the register of the United States Land Office at Los Angeles, dated June 9, 1913, in which that officer declares that as a matter of fact no final certificate has ever been issued out of said office for the said quarter section, and in effect makes the singularly novel proposition that, in determining whether the complaint is wanting in the statement of a cause of action because no title of any character to said land has vested in Francis or O'Brien, this court may by virtue of the provisions of section 1875, subdivision 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, take judicial notice of the fact that no final certificate has ever been issued out of said land office for a patent to said land, and to aid it the court may inspect or examine the said certified statement of the register. The proposition is so obviously unsound that it would seem that no notice should be given to it. However, counsel make the point and the obvious reply is that the rule referred to is one of evidence and not of pleading. It is only the statement of a proposition plainly within the realm of commonplaces to say that, in passing upon the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of a complaint to state a cause of action, it is wholly beyond the scope of the inquiry to ascertain whether the facts stated are true or untrue. That is always the ultimate question to be determined by the evidence upon a trial of the questions of fact. Obviously, the complaint, when appropriately challenged, whether for want of sufficient facts or for an insufficient or inartificial statement of the facts, must stand or fall by its own force. Nothing dehors the pleading itself can be considered to determine whether it is obnoxious to objections made against it as a pleading.

[5] It is next contended that the complaint shows that the defendant Mary F. Francis, previously to the commencement of this action, had transferred her right, title, and interest in and to the premises in question to one Good, that she now has no interest in the property to which the lease relates, that she is not the real party in interest, and that, as to her, specific performance of the contract for a lease is impossible. The complaint does not state that Mrs. Francis had disposed of or sold the land in question. It alleges that she entered into a contract with said Good whereby she agreed to sell to him the 35 acres, and that Good transferred said contract and his right to purchase thereunder to the defendant West Virginia Oil Company. No sale of the property by virtue of the terms of said contract had been consummated, so far as the complaint shows. Mrs. Francis, being still the owner of the property, is, of course, legally capable of executing the lease. It was manifestly proper to make the defendant West Virginia Oil Company a party defendant, since it claimed some interest in the property by reason of the contract for the sale of the land.

[6, 7] The last point made is that the contract for the lease is not supported by a consideration, and that the consideration moving to Francis for the execution of the lease is not shown by the complaint to be adequate.

The rule that adequacy of consideration for a contract whose terms are sought to be enforced through a decree of a court of equity must be pleaded and proved is not only expressly declared by our Code (Civ. Code § 3391), but is so firmly settled by the authorities that it is unnecessary to cite any upon that proposition. And we think it is made very clear by the complaint in the case at bar that that rule, so far as pleading is concerned, has been fully complied with both as to the contract which constitutes the basis of this action and the proposed lease. The contract for the lease recites that:

"For and in consideration of the said development work performed and to be performed by the said party of the second part upon and for the benefit of said northeast quarter of said section hereinabove described and for other good and sufficient considerations moving from the party of the second part," etc.

Thus it will be noted that one of the considerations for the contract of lease was "development work" already performed by Fox, and this itself was a consideration sufficient to support said contract. As to the lease itself, the contract provides that the lessee shall do all the work of drilling wells, furnish all the labor and materials and machinery and erect structures and such other appurtenances as may be necessary for the production of oil in paying quantities, pay all taxes on all the personal property on the premises, including the machinery and structures referred to, and pay to the lessor, "as rent or royalty for said lands, one-eighth of all the proceeds of oil or other substances which may be produced or saved from the premises, and from the wells therein, less the amount consumed in production"; that the royalty so due and to be paid to the lessor by the lessee shall be paid in products or cash at the option of the lessor, the latter to furnish the lessee with a monthly statement showing production of oil and other substances from the land. We cannot say that this does not constitute a fair, just, and reasonable consideration. At any rate, on the face of the complaint it appears to be adequate and equitable.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to allow the respondent such time within which to answer the complaint as to it may appear reasonable.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; ELLISON, Judge pro tem.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by George W. Tubbs against the Stone & Webster Construction Company and Jack Brown. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

M. K. Harris, L. B. Hayhurst, and George Cosgrave, all of Fresno, for appellant. Barnard & Watters, of Fresno, and James A. Watt, of San Francisco, for respondents.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him while in the employ of the corporation defendant. At the close of the testimony introduced on behalf of the plaintiff the defendants moved the court for a judgment of nonsuit, which motion was granted. From the judgment that followed this appeal is prosecuted.

The record shows that, in September, 1913, the defendant corporation was engaged in the construction of a concrete wall as part of a power house in Fresno county, and had in its employ, engaged in said work, a number of men, including the plaintiff. At the time of the accident to the plaintiff the wall had been built up to a height of about 40 feet. Below it on the ground level there was a cement floor. Around the inside of the wall was a plank runway 4 feet wide supported by scaffolding. The runway had no railing or anything else on its side as a protection to those working upon it. It was of rectangular shape. The work of filling the molds with cement in constructing the wall was being done as follows: At one corner of the runway was a hopper into which the cement was placed by means of a hoist that brought it up from the ground. On the runway some 18 men were working, each with a wheelbarrow. The wheelbarrows were 30 inches wide, and weighed 75 pounds when empty and 250 pounds when loaded with cement. Each man would place his wheelbarrow under the spout of the hopper, and it would be filled by pulling a lever and letting the cement run into it. Then it would be moved to the place on the wall where needed and be emptied into the molds or forms, after which it would be pushed in the same direction it had been moving and around the runway until it again came to the hopper. In this work the men with their wheelbarrows formed a continuous procession. The plaintiff was employed to wheel one of these wheelbarrows, and had been at work about one hour and a half when the accident occurred. The plaintiff testified:

"Well, I was wheeling concrete, you know, when we would empty our wheelbarrow we would go around back to the chute and fill up again; and Brown, when I brought a wheelbarrow around, he said, 'Turn around and go back; you are losing too much time going on around.' Q. Where was Brown at that time? A. He was right about here (indicating). Right about opposite to me when he spoke to me. Q. The point you are speaking of is where you were dumping the concrete, I believe? A. Yes, sir. Q. What else did he say to you? A. I don't know exactly what he said; he said, 'Turn around and go back; you are losing too damn much time going around this way.' Q. What did you do then? A. I just set down my wheelbarrow and started back with it. Q. Had you already emptied your wheelbarrow at that time? A. Yes, sir; I had just emptied my wheelbarrow when he told me to go around, turn around and go back. When I started back I saw another wheelbarrow coming from the dumper here, and so I knew I couldn't pass him, you know; so I pulled my wheelbarrow around and straightened up to allow him room to pass, and I don't know what happened after that; I was struck, and I went down, and I don't know just exactly — Q. How far down did you go? A. I should judge about 35 or 40 feet. Q. Did you strike on the way down? A. I must have. I was cut up underneath the jaw, and the whole side of my face was cut up, and this leg was broken. Q. Which leg broken? A. Left one, half way to the knee. Q. Mr. Tubbs, at the time that you turned back, do you know whether the runway there was wide enough so that another wheelbarrow could pass you? A. I thought it was wide enough by the other man being careful, because there was room enough if he had been careful. Q. Had you been wheeling before that time, using a wheelbarrow on this runway? A. Not on that runway; no, sir."

On cross-examination he testified:

"Q. Was there any man following you with a load? A. Well, yes there was another man following me; but I didn't know he was following me. Q. You didn't know he was following you? A. No, until I turned around and Brown told me to start back, and I took my wheelbarrow like this (indicating) and started back, and as I started back I saw this other fellow coming; and I thought, after I pulled my wheelbarrow up like that (indicating), there would be room for him to pass, and there would have been room if he had been careful. I don't know exactly, but I was about 15 feet from the loading point. Q. In starting back how many steps had you taken before you fell? A. I took two or three steps I believe as near as I can say. Q. How near did you approach the man coming in the opposite direction? A. I don't know exactly how near I was to him. I see him coming, and I pulled up that way just to allow him room to pass. There would have been room enough if he had been careful. Q. You said this morning in answer to your counsel that you knew you couldn't pass him, did you not? A. I was going along with the wheelbarrow that way (indicating). I knew I could not have done it that way (indicating). I pulled up the wheelbarrow to allow him to pass. Q. You knew you couldn't pass him on that narrow walk, did you? A. Yes, sir. Q. The two wheelbarrows were wider than the walk, were they not? A. Yes, sir. Q. You saw it was dangerous, didn't you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you knew that it was dangerous, did you not? A. Well, it wouldn't have been dangerous if he had been careful. Q. How close would you have to stand to the edge in order to allow him to pass with a loaded wheelbarrow? A. I would have to stand right on the edge. Q. And you say that there was a sheer fall there of 40 feet or thereabouts? A. Yes, sir. Q. But you knew it was there? A. Yes, sir. Q. How near did you approach him before you fell? A. Oh, about, I don't know, about 8 or 9 feet, maybe 10. I don't know how far I saw him coming, and I knew I could not pass him. Q. He was still 8 or 9 feet from you when you fell? A. Yes, sir."

The defendants' motion for a nonsuit was made upon the grounds: (1) That the evidence failed to prove the negligence alleged in the complaint; (2) that the evidence shows without conflict that the accident occurred by reason of the plaintiff's negligence in—

"voluntarily, carelessly, and negligently and unnecessarily approaching too near to the outer side of the runway; (3) that the danger of drawing to one side of the runway and attempting to permit another person to pass with a loaded wheelbarrow in the position he was, and the danger of his attempting to return towards the point of loading in the same direction in which he had come, was so obvious and so apparent that to do so was to assume the risk of the accident occurring necessarily involved; that the danger of falling by attempting to draw near to the side of the runway with his wheelbarrow to permit another to pass with a loaded wheelbarrow was obviously so dangerous that any person in possession of his faculties could not be justified in doing so, even at the command of his employer."

We rely in this motion upon the testimony of the plaintiff himself and upon the law as declared by the Supreme Court in the case of Hall v. Clark, 163 Cal. 392, 125 Pac. 1047.

[1] Upon the first ground of the motion little need be said. That the defendant corporation owed a duty to the plaintiff, not to order him to return with his wheelbarrow in the direction from which others with loaded wheelbarrows were approaching upon a narrow runway 40 feet high, unprotected by a railing, is too obvious to need discussion. We do not understand that the defendant seriously contends that defendant was not guilty of negligence in giving to the plaintiff the order it did.

The statements, contained in the motion, of conduct of the plaintiff claimed to justify a nonsuit were twofold: (1) That he was guilty of contributory negligence causing the accident; and (2) that he assumed the risks involved in trying to obey the orders he had received. These two defenses, while often considered together without much attempt to distinguish them, involve different rules and principles, and, while both may and often do coexist in the same case, yet they are not the same. A person may undertake to do a very dangerous thing and yet do it in a very careful manner. The difference between the two defenses is very clearly stated in the case of Choctaw, etc., R. R. Co. v. Jones, 77 Ark. 367, 92 S. W. 244, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 837,

7 Ann. Cas. 430, from which we make the following excerpts:

"The defense of contributory negligence rests on some fault or omission of duty on the part of the plaintiff, and is maintainable even though the defendant has been guilty of negligence. * * * It applies when the defendant is asking damages for an injury which would not have happened but for his own carelessness. On the other hand, the defense of assumed risk is said to rest on contract, which is generally implied from the circumstances of the case; it being a term which the law imports into the contract, when nothing is said to the contrary, that the servant will assume the ordinary risks of the service for which he is paid. * * * In other words, the defense of assumed risk rests on the fact that the servant voluntarily, or at least without physical coercion, exposed himself to the danger, and thus assumed the risk thereof. Having done this of his own accord, he has no right, if an injury results, to call on another to compensate him therefor, whether he was guilty of carelessness or not. * * * In the application of the doctrine of assumption of risks a distinction must be also made between those cases where the injury is due to one of the ordinary risks of the service and when it is due to some altered condition of the service, caused by the negligence of the master. The servant is presumed to know the ordinary risks. It is his duty to inform himself of them, and, if he negligently fails to do so, he will still be held to have assumed them. * * * But the servant is not presumed to know of risks and dangers caused by negligence of the master after he enters the service, which change the conditions of the service. If he is injured by such negligence he cannot be said to have assumed the risk, in the absence of knowledge on his part that there was such a danger. Where the condition of the service is thus altered, and the servant is brought face to face with a danger of that kind not ordinarily incident to the work, then, as before stated, new questions are presented. The plea of the master that the servant assumed the risk is met in such a case by the answer that the danger arose from the master's own negligence, which is not one of the risks assumed by the servant. This being so, the master, to make good his defense of assumed risk, must go further and show that the servant voluntarily subjected himself to the new danger with full knowledge and appreciation thereof; for such risk constitutes an addition to those ordinarily incident to the service, and there is no presumption that he had knowledge of it, or assumed it. * * * But plaintiff in this case exposed himself to the danger in obedience to an order of the foreman. As the danger was brought about by the negligence of the foreman, before it can be said, as a matter of law, that plaintiff assumed the risk thereof by the mere fact that he went ahead with his work, it must be clearly shown that when he did so he knew and appreciated the danger to which he exposed himself by doing the work."

[2] Considering the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff as distinguished from assumption of risk: He had been ordered to turn back with his wheelbarrow on the plank runway, and obeyed. After he had turned and started back he noticed another wheelbarrow coming towards him, and discovered for the first time that the two could not pass if both were rolled along in the ordinary manner. He was thus confronted with a new and unexpected situation and danger. Thinking quickly and without much time for deliberation, he decided that by stepping towards the edge of the runway and placing his wheelbarrow in an upright position, the other could pass him with safety. He accordingly adopted this course of action, and, either by being struck by the wheelbarrow or by losing his balance (the record is not clear as to which) he fell and was injured. Whether under the circumstances it was negligence for him to move to the edge to let the other wheelbarrow pass and whether in doing so he acted carelessly were questions that the jury should have been permitted to pass upon. The evidence and all the attending circumstances, with all the inferences that might be drawn therefrom, did not present such a case as to make his negligence a pure question of law. He was only required to do what was reasonable under existing circumstances. The case was undoubtedly one where the reasonableness of the effort to escape injury after the discovery of the danger was a question for the jury to be determined by them in view of all the circumstances shown by the evidence.

"If the plaintiff is suddenly put into peril, without having sufficient time to consider all the circumstances, he is excusable for omitting some precautions, or making an unwise choice under this disturbing influence, although if his mind had been clear, he ought to have done otherwise. This is especially true if the peril is caused by the defendant's fault; and of such case it is said: 'Even if, in bewilderment, he runs directly into the danger which he fears, he is not at fault. The confusion of mind, caused by such negligence, is part of the injury inflicted by the negligent person.'" Antonian v. S. P. Co., 9 Cal. App. 723, 100 Pac. 882.

[3, 4] As to assumption of risk: The risk he incurred in turning back and trying to pass another wheelbarrow was not one of the ordinary risks of his employment but, in the language of the decision quoted from, it was a "risk caused by the negligence of the master after he entered the service and which changed the condition of the service," and, as said in the same case:

"As the danger was brought about by the negligence of the foreman, before it can be said, as a matter of law, that plaintiff assumed the risk thereof by the mere fact that he went ahead with his work, it must be clearly shown that when he did so he knew and appreciated the danger to which he exposed himself by doing the work."

We think the plaintiff's evidence does not make it clearly appear that when he entered upon the performance of the new order, given him by the foreman, he knew and appreciated the danger involved in obedience. His testimony is fairly susceptible of the construction that not until he has started back with his wheelbarrow, and not until he saw the other wheelbarrow approaching him, did he know or realize that the two wheelbarrows could not be wheeled by each other with safety. Up to this point, then, he had not assumed the risk incident to changed conditions of his work. Not knowing at that time that the two wheelbarrows could not pass, he did not "know and appreciate the danger of obeying the order he had received."

"The servant's dependent and inferior position is to be taken into consideration; and, if the master gives him positive orders to go on with the work, under perilous circumstances, the servant may recover for an injury thus incurred, if the work was not obviously so dangerous that no man of ordinary prudence would have obeyed." Shearman & Redfield on Neg. (6th Ed.) § 207h. "When ordered into a place of danger the servant will not be chargeable with having assumed the risk, unless so glaring that no prudent man would have encountered it, if he acts with reasonable prudence in its execution." Shearman & Redfield on Neg. (6th Ed.) § 207h, notes. "But the present case comes under a limitation to that doctrine, to the effect that, if the danger is not so absolute, or imminent, that injury must almost necessarily result from obedience to the order, and the servant obeys the order and is injured, the master will not be allowed to defend, on the ground that the servant ought not to have obeyed the order." Choctaw, etc., R. R. Co. v. Jones, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 858, note.

The conclusions we have reached on this branch of the case are not at all in conflict with the decision in Hall v. Clark, 163 Cal. 392, 125 Pac. 1047, but are in harmony with it. The two cases are readily differentiated. In that case the plaintiff could know and appreciate the dangers incident to obeying the order as soon as it was made. The situation was visible, apparent, and known. In this case the danger was not known or appreciated until the risk had been well entered upon. In that case the plaintiff, with full knowledge of all the facts, did a manifestly dangerous act. In this case the plaintiff, after being placed in a dangerous position, before he knew it was dangerous, moved to one side to let the other man pass, believing it was a safe thing to do if the other man was careful, as he testifies, and we are not prepared to say that a jury would or ought to have found that the act was one no ordinarily prudent man would have attempted under the circumstances.

[5] Thus far the case has been considered without reference to the provisions of the act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 796), known as the Employers' Liability Act. That act deals with both contributory negligence and assumption of risk as defenses to actions of this kind, but gives a different effect to each. Contributory negligence by that act is made a conditional defense. Assumption of the risk of the hazard is denied all efficacy as a defense. Under that act contributory negligence does not bar a recovery where it is slight and that of the employer is gross in comparison, but the damages may be diminished by reason of such contributory negligence.

So in this case, if the jury had found that the plaintiff was negligent in trying to pass the wheelbarrow in the manner he did, they could not then have given a verdict in favor of the defendant for that reason, unless they also found that his negligence was more than slight as compared to the negligence of the defendant. A case might arise when great negligence on the part of a plaintiff would be considered slight when compared with the negligence of the defendant. So, even if, in this case, the plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributory to the injury, still it was for the jury to compare it with the negligence of the defendant and, if found to be slight in comparison, give a verdict for him with a reduction of amount on account thereof, but not give a verdict for the defendant unless the plaintiff's negligence was found to be more than slight in comparison with the defendant's negligence.

The plaintiff testified that to permit the other man to pass him would not be dangerous if the other was careful. If the jury believed this statement, they would have been justified under the circumstances in finding that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence, or, if he was, that it was only slight as compared with defendant's.

[6] The Employers' Liability Act provides: "It shall not be a defense (1) That the employé, either expressly or impliedly, assumed the risk of the hazard complained of."

This would seem to dispose of the claim that plaintiff cannot recover because he assumed the risk of the hazard. It is to be noted that this act was not in force when the cause of action arose in Hall v. Clark, 163 Cal. 392, 125 Pac. 1047, and in the decision that feature is incidentally referred to. See page 395. The act does not use the expression "risk of the employment" but "risk of the hazard complained of," and this is broad enough to include both the ordinary and extraordinary risks of an employment.

"But even if it be said that the station as used by Crabbe was in an unsafe condition, and that he knew it, this amounts to no more than a declaration that Crabbe assumed the risk of a known hazard. But this fact, by the very terms of the Employers' Liability Act, no longer affords the employer a defense." Crabbe v. Mammoth etc., Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 Pac. 714.

Our conclusion is that the jury should have been permitted to pass upon the case. The judgment is reversed.

SLYE et al. (S. F. 6934.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 24, 1916.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⚡335—RECOVERY OF PURCHASE MONEY PAID—EFFECT OF PURCHASER'S DEFAULT.

Under a contract terminating the vendor's obligations unless the purchase price was promptly paid, the purchasers cannot recover part payments where they defaulted as to the balance, for such failure terminated their rights without any affirmative act by the vendor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 981-983; Dec. Dig. ⚡335.]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⚡170—PAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY—OBLIGATION TO PAY.

Under such a contract, the purchasers must tender payment before the vendor is required to put them in possession, notwithstanding tenants at will occupy part of the land, for their presence does not establish the vendor's inability to deliver possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 344-348; Dec. Dig. ⚡170.]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⚡58 — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT — ACCOUNTING CLAUSE.

The vendor's agreement to render the purchaser an accounting "upon the final consummation of the purchase," according to the contract does not make such accounting a necessary part of the vendor's offer of performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 88; Dec. Dig. ⚡58.]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⚡336 — PERFORMANCE—WAIVER OF DEFECT.

The purchasers' failure to specify the defects in an accounting rendered by the vendor as part of his offer of performance waived any infirmities therein under Civ. Code, § 1501, providing that objections to the mode of an offer of performance are waived unless stated.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Suit to quiet title by the Schwerin Estate Realty Company against Joseph Slye and L. H. Condon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. W. Hubbard, of San Francisco, for appellants. J. J. Lermen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued to quiet its title to certain real property in San Mateo county. Defendants answered, setting up certain contracts of sale upon which they had paid to plaintiff $5,000 on account of the purchase price of the land. In the answer it was averred that the consideration for the $5,000 wholly failed because plaintiff was not by itself in possession of the land, but that the premises were held by divers persons who had growing crops thereon, and because plaintiff had failed to account for certain receipts and disbursements as stipulated in the contracts. There was a cross-complaint by which the writings between the parties to the action were set up, and the inability of the vendor to give possession of the land on account of the occupancy and use thereof by other persons was pleaded, as well as the failure of plaintiff to account to defendants as provided by the contract. The prayer of the cross-complaint was for $5,000, and the cross-complainants asked that the amount of any judgment which might be given in their behalf should be made a lien on the property. Issue was joined on all of the allegations of the cross-complaint, and in its answer the Schwerin Estate Realty Company denied that it was not in possession of all of the lands involved, denied its inability to deliver possession thereof, and affirmatively averred that on the 20th of February, 1913, which was the last day for the performance of the contract by the vendees, said vendor was, and had been ever since, and continuously had been up to March 28, 1913, ready, able, and willing to deliver to defendants possession of the whole of the land described in the contracts, if said defendants would keep and perform their part of the agreement. The Schwerin Estate Realty Company also denied the allegation that it had not rendered an account as called for, but, on the contrary, alleged that it had fully kept and performed all of its part of the agreement. After trial of the issues the court gave judgment, quieting plaintiff's title to the property and denying any relief under the cross-complaint. Defendants prosecute their appeal from the judgment.

[1] It is admitted that defendants neither alleged nor proved their readiness, willingness, and ability at any time to perform their part of the contracts of sale, and respondent insists that such failure is fatal to their cause of action. The original contract between the vendor and Messrs. Slye and Condon called for a completion of the transaction by November 20, 1912. Appellants not having performed the agreement on their part, another contract was executed extending the time, and appellants paid $3,000 on the purchase price in addition to the $1,000 previously deposited. A further extension was granted on payment of an additional sum of $1,000 and an agreement dated January 18, 1913, was executed. By its terms February 20, 1913, was made the date of final payment. Time was expressly made of the essence of the agreement of January 18, 1913, and failure to perform by defendants, under the terms of said contract, would work a forfeiture of all rights of the vendees, leaving the sums previously paid in the possession of the vendor as liquidated damages. We cannot escape from the conclusion that by failing to prove their readiness, ability, and willingness to perform their part of the contract within the time limited therein, the defendants utterly failed to establish their right to any relief. The finding of the court in this behalf is that:

"Said defendants Joseph Slye and L. H. Condon have failed to prove or assert that on the said 20th day of February, 1913, or at any time thereafter, or at any other time, they or either of them offered to perform the obligations of said contracts upon their part to be kept or performed, or that at any of said times they, or either of them, were able or willing to perform the said obligations of the said contracts upon their part to be kept or performed."

Under the terms of the contract no affirmative act on the part of the vendor was necessary to place the vendees in default. It expressly made failure to comply with its terms within the time limited "by the parties of the second part" (Slye and Condon) an automatic termination of all of the vendor's obligations in law and equity. Of this agreement it may be said, just as Mr. Justice Henshaw said in Glock v Howard, 123 Cal. 1-16, 55 Pac. 713, 718 (43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17):

"In the case at bar, the payment of the final amount under the contract, at the time and in the manner agreed upon, was a condition precedent to the right of the vendee to demand a conveyance. Upon his failure to make payment the vendee committed a breach, and no affirmative act upon the part of the vendor was necessary to bring about this result."

But respondent as late as March 28, 1913, tendered a deed and offered to put defendants in actual possession of the property upon payment of the balance of the purchase price. If the vendees had desired to consummate the contract or to recover back their deposit, they should have made a tender of the balance due, and should have demanded performance by the vendor. Not having done this, they are not in a position to demand the relief for which they have prayed. Griesemer v. Hammond, 18 Cal. App. 535-540, 123 Pac. 818; Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 739-745, 93 Pac. 1007; Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 162 Cal. 539-544, 123 Pac. 363; List v. Moore, 20 Cal. App. 616-622, 129 Pac. 474.

[2] The position taken by defendants seems to be that because a part of plaintiff's land was occupied by tenants at will on February 20, 1913, plaintiff was not in a position to put them in possession of the land, and was therefore in default. But as we have seen, under the terms of the contract defendants were to be the first actors by proffering payment of the balance of the purchase price. Of course, if the vendor had placed the property in such a condition that it could not convey title according to the terms of the contract, the vendees might have been relieved of the necessity of tender of the money or of a showing of willingness on their part to perform, but it is not denied—indeed it is admitted—that plaintiff had title to the land. Persons, admittedly tenants at will, were in occupancy of part of the land, but that did not justify the vendees in saying, in effect, to the vendor, "When you evict these people and present us a deed, then we will talk to you about payment." Since the contract was one by which their rights were automatically terminated by their failure to tender the purchase money, it was of the very essence of their case that the vendees should show an ability and willingness to perform on their part and prevention of performance by the vendor. They showed neither because the mere presence of the tenants at will on the land did not prove the vendor's inability to comply with the terms of the contract of sale.

However, the court found that the tenants were not claiming the right to remain upon the land, and that at all times on and after the 20th of February, 1913, they were ready on demand to surrender possession of the parts of the property which they respectively occupied. This finding was based upon the testimony of Deferrari, a witness for defendants, a gardener who with certain associates was engaged in market gardening on the land. These men were working the property on shares, and the enterprise was conducted in the name of the witness who owned the largest interest therein. Without reviewing it in detail we may say that this evidence was sufficient to support the finding.

[3, 4] The finding that plaintiff and cross-defendant complied with the requirement for an accounting was also supported, but in reality the matter of an accounting was a false quantity in the case. By a supplemental contract of January 20, 1913, it was agreed that "upon the final consummation of the purchase * * * according to the terms of the attached contract" (the agreement of sale), an accounting should be rendered by the vendor to the vendee, showing the moneys collected after November, 1912, by the former from various holders of contracts of purchase of lots, and showing also the amount of the corporation's payments or obligations to pay on account of certain specified indebtedness. The giving of this account was not made a condition precedent to the offer on the part of vendees to perform. However, on February 20, 1913, plaintiff's counsel did send an accounting which was obviously intended to comply with the requirements of the agreement of January 20th. Appellants contend that the account rendered was not in compliance with the supplemental agreement, but in their pleadings they do not specify its infirmities, nor did they allege or prove any objection on their part ever offered to its form or substance. Even if we should regard the accounting as a necessary part of the vendor's offer of performance (and we do not), we should be bound to hold that by failing to offer objections to it the vendees waived its infirmities. It follows from the foregoing that the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 25, 1916.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS § 291(5) — ENFORCEMENT—VARIANCE BETWEEN PLEADING AND PROOF.

A complaint to foreclose a mechanic's lien alleged performance of the contract, but it appeared that the building was partly erected on other land than that specified in the contract. Held, that plaintiff, having pleaded full compliance with the contract, could not recover by showing an excuse for his nonperformance.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Trout, Judge.

Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien by Andrew Herdal against Minnie Sheehy, substituted in place of William J. Sheehy, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stafford & Stafford, of San Francisco, for appellant. Cullinan & Hickey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The action was one for the foreclosing of a lien upon real property in the city and county of San Francisco. Defendant did not dispute the following facts: William J. Sheehy, her predecessor in interest, entered into a contract with plaintiff's assignors according to the terms of which they were to erect a building upon his land. The contract price was $3,565, payable in four installments. W. J. Sheehy filed and recorded a written acceptance of the building on March 8, 1910. All of the contract price was paid to plaintiff's assignors, except $660, the amount for which their lien was filed. The foregoing facts are not disputed, but the defense to the action was based upon the fact, found by the court, that the contractors, contrary to their written agreement with Mr. Sheehy, had erected the building partly upon his land and partly upon an adjacent public street. The court found that the defense was a good one and that the building had not been located in compliance with the terms of the contract because it was not entirely upon the property of William J. Sheehy. There was a further finding that when the formal acceptance was filed this error in the location of the building was unknown to Mr. Sheehy and that he did not waive the failure of the contractors to comply with the terms of their agreement.

Plaintiff had included in his complaint a count in quantum meruit, and upon the issue joined on this cause of action the court found that the reasonable value of the work done and materials furnished was less than the amount actually paid under the contract.

Appellant does not question the finding that the building was partly upon public property. His theory is that an independent contractor prepared the foundations for the building, and that in the execution of their contract for the erection of the superstructure plaintiff's assignors did nothing more than follow the directions of Mr. Sheehy to use said erroneously located foundations.

[1, 2] Even conceding the status of the builder of the foundations as an independent contractor (although he was paid by the contractors out of the moneys received by them on account of the contract price), plaintiff did not plead failure of complete performance, excused by the mistake in the location of the foundations, but on the contrary he declared on the theory of full compliance by the contractors with the terms of the written agreement. The lot upon which the building was to be erected was particularly described in the contract. Clearly, the placing of the building partly upon other land was not a compliance with the agreement. If appellant relied upon Mr. Sheehy's conduct as an excuse for nonperformance he should have set up both the nonperformance and the excuse. This he failed to do and he may not take advantage of it without pleading. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 867. Appellant denies the application of this doctrine to building contracts because the courts have held that equity will always give judgment in suits on such contracts if there has been substantial performance, deducting from the price the damage on account of defects, citing in this behalf Marchant v. Hayes, 117 Cal. 669-672, 49 Pac. 840. It is true that in the opinion in that case it is said, arguendo, that:

"It has been sometimes held that where a contractor under a bona fide attempt to perform his contract has unintentionally omitted some trifling particular, he may recover upon the contract, making a reduction for the damage sustained by the omission."

But the general rule is emphatically stated in the opinion. It is that one who has acted by virtue of a written contract has no right of recovery, unless he can show that he had completed the contract on his part or that completion had been waived or excused. In this case appellant failed to show substantial compliance with the contract and he did not plead excuse for his failure to build the house upon the property specified in the contract.

[3] But eliminating all questions of pleading and giving plaintiff the benefit of every equitable right, we cannot see that the trial court committed error. It is not asserted that Mr. Sheehy intentionally misled the builders nor that Hegvold, who constructed the foundations, was intentionally at fault or that he was ever aware of his blunders. The contract specified that the structure was to be upon Mr. Sheehy's lot, not that it was to be erected upon certain prepared foundations. The court found that the cost to Mrs. Sheehy to correct the fault in construction would be more than $660, the amount claimed by plaintiff. Manifestly it would be unfair to compel the innocent owner to pay the contract price and then a large sum to have the building moved onto her lot and to allow the assignee of the builders to collect the full contract price for a building not in compliance with the plain terms of the written agreement. Mr. Sheehy and the builders were innocent of intentional wrong, but the latter were violators of substantial terms of the contract and should therefore be the sufferers, rather than the present owner of the land.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In Bank. Application for writ of review by the Western Grain & Sugar Products Company, Employer, and the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, Insurer, to review the award of compensation by A. J. Pillsbury and others as the Industrial Accident Commission, to the personal representative of Edward Shea, employé. Award affirmed.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, and W. H. Pillsbury, of Oakland, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Certiorari to review the award of the Industrial Accident Commission to the personal representative of one Edward Shea, upon the finding that the said Shea, who was a night watchman employed by Western Grain & Sugar Products Company, had met his death at the hands of persons unknown who had entered upon the property of his said employer. The findings and decision were made by a majority of the commissioners, Mr. Commissioner Weinstock writing a dissenting opinion.

Western Grain & Sugar Products Company had a warehouse in the town of Crockett, Contra Costa county. The property was bounded on one side by the straits of Carquinez and on all the other sides was inclosed either by buildings or by a fence about 8 feet in height. For some time prior to November 12, 1914, and on that day Edward Shea had been employed as night watchman on the premises by the said company. On that night he entered upon his customary duties at about 10 o'clock. On the following morning he had disappeared and he has not been seen since. The facts and conditions upon which the majority of the commissioners founded their conclusion that Shea had been murdered were as follows: On the morning of the 13th of November three pools of fluid partly reddish and partly gray were found on the wharf on the property of the Sugar Products Company. There were drops of fluid staining the wharf to its edge. There were marks such as might have been made by dragging a body from these pools over the edge of the wharf and into the water. Shea's cap was found in or near one of these pools. It was torn and crumpled, the tear, however, not extending through the lining. The tear was in the back part of the cap at a place which, when the cap was worn, would be near the base of the skull. Shea's unopened knife lay just at the edge of the wharf. In the engine room, where he made his headquarters, were found the card on which he checked off his hourly rounds, the entries indicating that he had made his last tour of duty about midnight. On the outside of the fence, which partially surrounded the property, were marks which might have been made by the feet of persons endeavoring to climb over. The fence was 8 feet high, but these marks only extended 3 feet 6 inches from the ground. Just opposite the marks inside the fence were found footprints in the earth. It was the theory of the claimant that these had been made by some man or men jumping from the top of the fence, but one witness Fox, the only person who spoke regarding their depth, said that the footprints were not deep enough to have been so produced. Early on the evening of the 12th of November two rough-appearing men had been seen in a saloon at Crockett. One of them had been heard talking with a third person about the advisability of going armed and had said that he always carried a weapon. About 7 o'clock on that evening and again at a time near midnight two men were seen at a point on the Southern Pacific right of way not far from the fence which we have described. One of these men was positively identified as one of the two who had visited the saloon at Crockett earlier in the evening. It was also in evidence that a door near the boiler room was found open on the morning after the watchman's disappearance. This door might be unfastened from the outside only with a key, but from the inside by a latch. It had a typical Yale lock. There was evidence also which tended to show that Shea's cap was not torn nor mutilated in any way when he left his home to go to his work at 9 o'clock on the evening of his disappearance. It was also shown by the uncontradicted evidence that Shea was sober, industrious, and apparently well satisfied with life, that he had no known enemies, and that his family relations were pleasant.

The water near the wharf was thoroughly dragged after Shea's absence was discovered, but no trace of the body of the missing man was found. Nothing was stolen from the premises, and there was no evidence of the absence of any articles which might have been used to weight a dead body. The testimony regarding the blood is well summed up in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Commissioner Weinstock as follows:

"If it were a fact that the large pools of blood were human blood or spinal fluid, it would lend color to the assumption that it was the blood of the deceased, and that he had been murdered. Under date of May 26, 1915, Dr. Victor, the bacteriologist to whom had been sent the blood in the possession of Sheriff Veale, reported thereon to the effect that the material which was actually blood was not human blood, and that of the two specimens sent, the one giving positive evidence of being animal blood was positively not human blood, and the other material, not having the visual characteristics of blood, gave one reaction indicating that it was human blood, and one reaction which is testimony against the theory that the fluid emanated from a human being."

[1] The first attack of petitioners is upon the finding that Shea was murdered. As the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission to act at all depends upon this ultimate fact as found, we are not precluded from examining the evidence upon which it is based. If that evidence is not sufficient in any view to justify the finding of death by violence we will be compelled to nullify the award made by the Industrial Accident Commission. Del Mar Water, Light & Power Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 669, 140 Pac. 591, 948; Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 Pac. 398. We shall determine whether or not there was substantial evidence that Edward Shea was murdered.

[2] The burden was upon the applicant to establish by competent proof the death of Shea. Doubtless such proof may be made by circumstantial evidence, and the actual finding of the body is not an indispensable requisite to a conclusion, in a civil case, that one has met his death by violence.

[3] While a person unheard of for a time is presumed to be alive until the expiration of 7 years (Benjamin v. District Grand Lodge, etc., 152 Pac. 731; Rogers v. Manhattan Life Insurance Co., 138 Cal. 285-294, 71 Pac. 348), the absence, coupled with other circumstances, may be sufficient to prove death at a much earlier time. The case last cited is one in which the disappearance of a passenger from a steamer between ports and the finding of a note in which he declared his intention of drowning himself, together with other circumstances, were held sufficient to "quicken the time" so as to raise the presumption of death before the expiration of the statutory period fixed by subdivision 26 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[4] Petitioner contends that the test to be applied in such a case as this is whether or not there is substantial evidence which would render death more probable than a continuation of life, citing in support of that rule such cases as Rogers v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 138 Cal. 285, 71 Pac. 348, The San Rafael, 141 Fed. 270, 72 C. C. A. 388, and Fidelity Mutual Life Association Co. v. Mettler, 185 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 662, 46 L. Ed. 922. Measured by such authorities the facts presented by the testimony given before the Industrial Accident Commission are sufficient to justify the finding of death by violence. Indeed the circumstances are quite as convincing as those reviewed in any of the opinions cited. Even if we eliminate the marks on the fence and footprints on the ground there is left substantial evidence of violence. The wharf was accessible from the water and the assailant or assailants of the night watchman might have come by boat. The open door might indicate that at least one person went out through it and the condition of the door would fit either the theory of murder or that of a fabricated appearance intended to create the idea that Shea had been killed. But nevertheless we cannot say that there was not sufficient evidence to support the finding which is attacked. Undeniedly if there was blood of one of the lower animals on the wharf that fact would lend strength to the suspicion that Shea might have invented the circumstantial evidence. The expert who examined the specimens of fluid taken from the wharf did not testify before the commission personally, and it does not appear from the record before us by what method he reached his conclusions. If he had reported that all of the specimens were of other than human origin and if the commissioners had felt themselves bound to accept his deductions there would be very strong ground for suspecting that Shea had fabricated the appearances of violence. But his report was that some of the fluid gave a reaction indicating that it was human blood. The specimens were taken from the same vicinity. The surroundings indicated that they came from the same source. The mixed result of the expert's experiments, therefore, would indicate that his method of examination was faulty. It was evidently some chemical process because "reactions" are mentioned. It does not appear that microscopy was resorted to and that the usual method of measuring corpuscles by use of a micrometer was followed. But whatever the process adopted, the result was such as would justify the commissioners in placing small weight upon the statement that the blood of one of the lower animals was in the pool. As counsel for respondent well expresses it: "The only effect of the test was to prove its own inconclusiveness."

The other circumstances speak most eloquently against the theories of suicide or flight and in support of that of death by violence. The torn cap which had been intact when Shea put it on, the marks on the wharf as of a body dragged to the edge, the location of the knife indicating that it probably dropped from a pocket as the body was lifted for its disposition either in the water or a waiting boat, the burning lantern, the coat left in the boiler room, the happy nature of the man, and his home life—all of these things indicate that his disappearance was due to his death by violence and not to an intentional desertion of his wife and minor children. He had been married for 33 years and had a family of 9 children, 4 of them still minors and 3 of these wholly dependent upon him for support. It is highly improbable that such a man would desert his family, and it is reasonably certain that he was killed just as the circumstances indicate that he was. We conclude therefore that the finding as to the death of Shea and the manner thereof must stand.

[5, 6] Petitioners make the further contention that even if the fact of death by violence be conceded the evidence does not warrant the finding that it was accidental and in the course of the watchman's employment.

Price v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 169 Cal. 800, 147 Pac. 1175, is cited as authority for the proposition that the possibility of Shea's death as a result of a conflict brought on by himself should have been negatived by the claimant. There is no merit in the contention and the cited case does not support it. In the Price Case it was merely decided that where death from a bullet wound caused by the discharge of a revolver in the hands of another is alleged a finding that death was not caused by accidental means is to be sustained upon a showing that it resulted from a conflict brought on by the person who was afterwards killed. The rule has no application to the facts in the proceeding under review. Shea was on the property which he was employed to watch and the circumstances indicate that he was slain at the post of duty and in its performance. A schoolmaster killed while trying to subdue two rebellious students was held to have met his death from "accident" within the meaning of the compensation law. Trim Joint District School v. Kelly, W. C. & Ins., Rep. 359. An assault upon a foreman by a vicious employé has been similarly classified by this court (Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 703, 151 Pac. 398), and in the recent case of Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 156 Pac. 491, 496, it was held that the surviving dependents of a night watchman, who was murdered while on duty, were entitled to compensation under the statute of California.

Other contentions were made by petitioners, but these have been settled by decisions of this court filed since the briefs herein were written. Therefore we will not discuss the said contentions.

The award is affirmed.

At the close of the argument, SHAW, J., delivered the opinion of the court, SLOSS, J., and LAWLOR, J., concurring.

There does not seem to be any merit in this appeal. The document offered as the will of decedent reads as follows:

There is nothing in the letter that tends in any way to show an intent by the decedent to make a disposition of her property after her death.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Adolphus E. Graupner, Judge.

Suit by George McDonald against Annie McDonald. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 168 Cal. 433, 143 Pac. 726.

Arthur Crane, of San Francisco, for appellant. James M. Hanley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from an adverse judgment. The action was one in which plaintiff sued for divorce on the ground of cruelty. On October 7, 1913, the default of defendant, Annie McDonald, was entered. Thereafter she gave notice of motion for an order setting aside the default and for a further order dismissing the action, announcing that the motion for the order opening the default would be based upon the ground of her excusable neglect, inadvertence, and surprise, while the other relief would be demanded upon a showing of condonation occurring since the commencement of the action. The notice of motion was accompanied by an affidavit of Annie McDonald, in which she deposed that she and the plaintiff had lived together after the commencement of the suit for divorce, and had agreed to dismiss said action; that depending upon plaintiff's promise to dismiss the suit, she did not cause an answer to be filed; and that she had "fully and fairly stated the facts" in the "action" to her counsel, who advised her that she had "a good and meritorious defense to said action." The motion came on for hearing on October 15, 1913. Defendant was called and examined upon her affidavit, and plaintiff and another witness were called and examined, and the court made an order denying the motion to set aside the default. To this defendant excepted upon the grounds that said order was an abuse of the court's discretion; that it was in excess of jurisdiction; and that it was against law. On October 20, 1913, the cause came on regularly for trial, both parties to the action being represented by counsel and the defendant being personally in court. Judgment was given for plaintiff as prayed, and an interlocutory decree was made and entered.

[1-3] Defendant insists that upon a motion to open a default it is not permissible to inquire into the truth of an affidavit of merits, citing Francis v. Cox, 33 Cal. 323; Gracier v. Weir, 45 Cal. 53; Douglass v. Todd, 96 Cal. 653.¹ Undoubtedly courts will not, as a general rule, examine into the truth of a defense where an affidavit of merits contains a statement of facts sufficient to constitute a defense, but this rule does not aid appellant in the case at bar, because it does not appear from the record that the falsity of the defense asserted by defendant was the only ground upon which the court refused to set aside the default. The bill of exceptions contains no word of the oral testimony given at the hearing. So far as the record shows, this testimony went in without objection, and appellant questions its admissibility for the first time on appeal. The order made by the court may have been supported by ample proof that defendant's asserted excuses for permitting the entry of the default were in fact utterly nonexistent. It is true that the transcript does contain this language:

"It appearing to the court from the testimony introduced that the claim of said defendant that she has a meritorious defense to said action is untrue."

But the quoted words are followed by this statement:

"And the court being fully advised in the premises made and entered its order."

The order itself is in general language; and, in view of the presumption in favor of the regularity of all proceedings of a court of record, we are bound to hold that the undisclosed testimony was sufficient to support the order. While it is not competent to try the merits of a defense upon the hearing of such a motion as this, it is always within the rights of the plaintiff to rebut, if possible, the excuse offered by the litigant against whom the default has been taken. That testimony was offered at the hearing by both parties to the proceedings appears in the record. It does not appear, however, what that testimony was, and we are bound to decide that it supported the conclusion reached by the court.

[4] An application of this kind is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, and its action in granting or denying the prayer of the petitioner will not be disturbed on appeal, unless a clear abuse of such discretion is shown. Morton v. Morton, 117 Cal. 443-446, 49 Pac. 557. Appellant having failed to show abuse of discretion, the order as made by the court below must stand.

The judgment is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Suit by the Woods Central Irrigating Ditch Company against the Porter Slough Ditch Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying new trial, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, and Murry & Knupp, of Porterville, for appellant. Bradley & Bradley, N. O. Bradley, and E. C. Farnsworth, all of Visalia, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from an adverse judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The action was brought to quiet plaintiff's title to a portion of the waters of Tule river. Defendant, by its answer, admitted that it did claim an estate and interest in the waters of Tule river and Porter slough, but denied that such claim was without right. There were other allegations in the answer which we will discuss later.

The court found that plaintiff was entitled to 80 cubic feet per second (the amount to which plaintiff asserted title) whenever that quantity of water was running in Tule river at the point of diversion of plaintiff's ditch, and that defendant was entitled to 67.6 cubic feet per second (the amount claimed) when that quantity of water was flowing in Porter slough. Defendant, however, objects to a priority improperly granted (so it is asserted) to plaintiff and contends further, that certain findings are entirely without the issues.

The court found that Tule river is and has been from time immemorial a natural water course, having its source in the Sierra Nevada Mountains and flowing thence in a general westerly direction; that from a point on or near section 4, township 22 south, range 28 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian, in Tulare county, said stream was until 1862 accustomed to flow in two or more natural channels, one of which was called Porter slough and the other Tule river—the former flowing through the town of Porterville, and the latter to the north of said town; that in 1862 the channel changed so that the stream which formerly ran north of the town became dry and a new channel was formed, which runs south of Porterville and has ever since been called Tule river. The court further found:

"That from time immemorial the said Porter slough has been and still is a natural stream, channel, and water course, having its source at Tule river at or near said section 4, and that from time immemorial a portion of the waters of said Tule river have been accustomed to run and flow in said channel of Porter slough westerly through the town of Porterville and thence in a westerly and northwesterly direction, when there was sufficient water in said Tule river to enable the same to naturally flow from said Tule river into said Porter slough as in these findings stated; that 140 cubic feet of water per second of the waters of Tule river naturally flow, and should be allowed to flow, on down Tule river below the point where the Porter slough leads therefrom before any of the waters of said Tule river naturally flow, or should be allowed to flow, in said Porter slough; that the next 40 cubic feet per second of the waters of Tule river naturally flow, and should be allowed to flow, from said Tule river into said Porter slough, and that all waters of the Tule river naturally flowing in said Tule river over and above 180 cubic feet per second at the point where Porter slough leads therefrom naturally divide, and should be divided, between said Tule river and said Porter slough at the ratio of 100 to said Tule river and 40 to said Porter slough—that is to say, when the waters of said Tule river at the point where said Porter slough leads therefrom, exceed in amount 180 cubic feet of water per second, then five-sevenths of such excess naturally flow and should be allowed to flow on down said Tule river, and two-sevenths of such excess naturally flow and should be allowed to flow into and down said Porter slough, and that proper appliances should be constructed and maintained in Tule river, at the point where Porter slough leads therefrom, so that the waters of said Tule river shall flow in Tule river below said point and in said Porter slough below said point, in the respective quantities herein determined, and not otherwise."

There were other findings to the effect that the plaintiff corporation was at the time of the commencement of the action and at the time of the trial the owner in fee of a certain irrigating ditch which leads out of Tule river at a specified point below the source of Porter slough, and that said plaintiff was the owner of and entitled to divert for beneficial purposes 80 cubic feet per second of the water of said stream when there was that quantity flowing therein; that ever since 1887, first the predecessors in interest of defendant and afterwards defendant itself had by means of a ditch and by dams in the channel and headgate in the ditch diverted from Porter slough at a point near Porterville

67.6 cubic feet of water per second whenever that quantity was flowing in the slough at the head of defendant's ditch; that said water had always been used for irrigation and other beneficial purposes; and that defendant was entitled to the quantity of water claimed when Porter slough carried that amount at the head of its ditch. But it was found that defendant's use of the water was not at all times open, exclusive, peaceable, continuous, under claim of right or hostile to plaintiff or its predecessors in interest or to the whole world. There were findings that defendant and its predecessors had been accustomed to keep the channel of Porter slough cleaned out and in condition to receive and carry its waters, and that they had been accustomed annually to remove from the head of Porter slough the gravel and boulders washed in by the high waters of Tule river. It was found that the owners of the Porter slough ditch had conducted the waters of the Porter slough from Tule river to the head of their ditch for more than 30 years, but that the diversion of water into Porter slough had not interfered with the rights of plaintiff until within 5 years next before the commencement of the action, and that the defendant was entitled to its demanded quantum of water only when that volume would naturally flow into Porter slough.

Appellant calls our attention to the fact that the complaint merely asks for a decree quieting plaintiff's title to a portion of the waters of Tule river, and that the elaborate findings regarding the proportion of the water flowing naturally by and beyond the source of Porter slough in Tule river and that running into said slough at the point where it takes its rise are outside of any issue possibly raised or triable in a simple suit to quiet title to water. Defendant's position is that the only issues before the court are: (1) The title of plaintiff to the waters of Tule river; (2) defendant's right to divert water from Tule river into Porter slough; and (3) the question of priority of the rights of the respective parties to divert water from the Tule river. Appellant earnestly insists that the court's finding which divided and apportioned the waters of Tule river between two natural water channels—Tule river and Porter slough—was entirely without the issues and beyond the province of the court in determining the rights of the contending parties. It is said that the complaint fails to allege that Wood Central Irrigating Ditch Company ever claimed the flow of any specific quantity of water past the head of Porter slough, and that for that reason there was no basis for the apportionment. In this behalf appellant cites such cases as Schirmer v. Drexler, 134 Cal. 134, 66 Pac. 180, Wallace v. Farmers' Ditch Company, 130 Cal. 578, 62 Pac. 1078, Reed v. Norton, 99 Cal. 617, 34

Pac. 333, and Kredo v. Phelps, 145 Cal. 526, 78 Pac. 1044. Respondent's counsel concede the existence of the rule invoked, but take the position that defendant's amended answer made all of the matters upon which the court found both relevant and absolutely necessary to a just determination of the cause. In its amended answer and also in its original answer (the two differing in this respect only in the amount of water claimed) defendant not only asserted its right to take water from Porter slough, but averred that for more than 30 years it and its predecessors had been accustomed to keep the channel of Porter slough free from obstructions, to divert its alleged share of the waters of Tule river into Porter slough, and to conduct the water so diverted through the channel of said Porter slough to the head of the Porter slough ditch.

[1] We think this pleading brought squarely within the issues the proper division of the waters of Tule river and Porter slough. In effect defendant pleaded and proved that by using Porter slough as an artificial channel, cleared of the accumulations brought down by flood waters, its right to diversion began at Tule river. It was therefore entirely proper for the court to determine exactly how much water defendant might take from Tule river at the very point where, according to the answer, defendant's right to the water attached.

[2] Section 580, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that if there be no answer the relief granted plaintiff may not exceed his demands, but in any other case the court may grant any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issues.

Defendant, by answering, may enlarge the scope of the relief to any extent consistent with the pleadings and "embraced within the issue." Cassinella v. Allen, 168 Cal. 677-680, 144 Pac. 746; Nathan v. Dierssen, 164 Cal. 607-611, 130 Pac. 12.

[3] It does not appear from the findings that defendant's right to a portion of the waters of Tule river antedated that of plaintiff, but even if it were apparent the mere matter of prior appropriation was not relevant. The reason for this is obvious and is seen in the finding that only within 5 years before the commencement of the action had defendant interfered with the natural division of the water flowing down Tule river to the head of Porter slough. Mere taking of the natural flow into Porter slough would not vest in defendant any right to alter the course of nature and by artificial means cause a greater flow into the slough. No other matters demand analysis.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 21, 1916.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨222—IRRIGATION — RECLAMATION ASSESSMENT — COLLECTION.

Reclamation assessments have not the character of a tax so as to be collectible by execution or levy upon the general property of the owner of the land against which the assessment is made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. ⇨222.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨222—IRRIGATION—"RECLAMATION DISTRICT."

A reclamation district is an agency of the state, or local public corporation, for purposes of local improvement, similar in that respect to an irrigation district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. ⇨222.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Reclamation District.]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨222—IRRIGATION—ASSESSMENT BY RECLAMATION DISTRICT—COLLECTION—STATUTE.

The law authorizing assessments by reclamation districts does not provide that the district may collect the same by ordinary judgment and execution against the person owning the land assessed; Pol. Code, § 3466, prescribing the only method of collection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. ⇨222.]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨216—IRRIGATION—COLLECTION OF RECLAMATION ASSESSMENT—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

A law, authorizing the collection of assessments by reclamation districts by ordinary judgment and execution against the person owning the land assessed would be unconstitutional, since no property can be subjected to the burden of paying the cost of such local improvement except property which is specially benefited, while resort to a personal judgment would impose a burden on property not benefited.

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨222—IRRIGATION—RECLAMATION ASSESSMENT—ENFORCEMENT AGAINST RAILROAD—STATUTE.

Under Pol. Code, § 3466, prescribing mode of collecting reclamation assessments, not expressly authorizing the sale of part of the right of way of a railroad to satisfy an assessment, the courts cannot allow the ordinary remedy of an action at law for the recovery of a personal judgment for the amount of an assessment merely because a part of an easement or franchise of a road used for its right of way cannot be sold under such a special assessment.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action to annul a reclamation assessment by Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company against Reclamation District No. 404 and others. From a judgment declaring the assessment valid, defendants appeal. Judgment affirmed.

A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, for appellants. E. W. Camp, U. T. Clotfelter, and M. W. Reed, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint in this case states a cause of action to annul an assessment levied by the reclamation district to pay the cost of certain reclamation work of the district. The ground of the action was that for various reasons, not necessary here to mention, the assessment was invalid. Issues were formed, there was a trial by the court, and findings of fact were made showing that the assessment was valid. As conclusions of law the court held that the assessment should not be annulled, but should be approved; that the same was a lien on the land against which it was assessed, but that defendants were not entitled to a personal judgment therefor against the plaintiff. Judgment was given accordingly, declaring the assessment valid and that the same constituted a lien on the land described, but "that the defendants have no other or further relief herein except the right to apply, and to act under, the provisions of section 3466 of the Political Code of the State of California; and that the said defendants be, and hereby are, remitted to said special proceedings provided for in said section for any and all other relief."

The defendants appeal from the portion of the judgment above quoted. The individual defendants, it may be remarked, are the trustees of said reclamation district. The only question presented for decision upon the appeal is whether or not the reclamation district has the right and power to collect a delinquent assessment by an ordinary action for the recovery of a personal judgment for money.

[1-4] Assessments of the kind here involved do not have the character of a tax so as to be collectible by execution or levy upon the general property of the owner of the land against which the assessment is made. Such assessments may be made upon the particular property because the improvement to be made with the money raised in that manner is presumed to benefit the property assessed to an amount at least equal to the charge against it. A reclamation district is an agency of the state, or local public corporation, for purposes of local improvement, similar in that respect to an irrigation district. That such a charge imposed by a local public corporation of that character is an assessment and not a tax was directly decided in San Diego v. Linda Vista I. D., 108 Cal. 193, 41 Pac. 291, 35 L. R. A. 33. The law, authorizing such assessments by reclamation districts, does not provide that the district may collect the same by ordinary judgment and execution against the person owning the land assessed. Section 3466 of the Political Code prescribes the method of collection, and as no other method is authorized, it follows that the method prescribed must be followed, and is the only remedy for the failure to pay the assessment when due. Even if the statute had provided that a personal judgment could be recovered, it would have been to that extent unconstitutional. This was decided after elaborate discussion in Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 254. The principle decided is that no property can be subjected to the burden of paying the cost of such local improvement except the property which is specially benefited thereby, and that to allow a resort to a personal judgment to enforce payment would, in effect, impose the burden upon property not benefited. The decision was adhered to in a number of cases immediately following it and it has become a well-established rule. Beaudry v. Valdez, 32 Cal. 279; Guerin v. Reese, 33 Cal. 296; Gaffney v. Gough, 36 Cal. 104; Coniff v. Hastings, 36 Cal. 292; Himmelman v. Steiner, 38 Cal. 179; Gillis v. Cleveland, 87 Cal. 217, 25 Pac. 351; Manning v. Den, 90 Cal. 617, 27 Pac. 435; Santa Cruz v. Bowie, 104 Cal. 286, 37 Pac. 934; Williams, Belser & Co. v. Rowell, 145 Cal. 261, 78 Pac. 725.

[5] The appellants refer to the finding that the land in controversy is used by the plaintiff as a way upon which it has constructed and is maintaining and operating its railroad, and to the decisions of this court holding that a part of the easement or franchise of such railroad used for its right of way cannot be sold under a special assessment of this character. Southern C. R. Co. v. Workman, 146 Cal. 80, 79 Pac. 586, 82 Pac. 79, 2 Ann. Cas. 583; Fox v. Workman, 155 Cal. 201, 100 Pac. 246; Miller & Lux v. Enterprise, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 429, 147 Pac. 567; Schaffer v. Smith, 169 Cal. 769, 147 Pac. 976. They assert that the fee, subject to the easement, is worthless, and would bring nothing if sold separately. The court so found. Upon these premises they base the argument that the effect of the decision, denying the right to a personal judgment, is to deny to the district any remedy for an admitted right, and that therefore the court should, in such a case, allow the ordinary remedy of an action at law for the recovery of a personal judgment, or some equivalent thereof. The answer is that the state is the sole judge of the remedies it will afford to a reclamation district to raise money with which to make the improvements. If the state sees fit to withhold the means necessary to enable such district to collect an assessment, the courts are powerless to interfere. They can only enforce the remedies provided by the law governing the subject. The statute does not expressly authorize the sale of a part of the right of way through a railroad for a special assessment, and therefore, under the rule established by the cases above cited, such sale cannot be made. This is a matter of policy within legislative control, and it is for that body, and not for the courts, to authorize such sale to enforce payment. The court below could not do otherwise than render the judgment above quoted.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 411—NOTICE TO CLERK TO PREPARE RECORD—SUFFICIENCY.

Notice to the clerk to prepare a record, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a, stating that defendant desires to appeal, but nowhere that it does appeal, is ineffectual to constitute an appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 2100; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 411.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter Shields, Judge.

Action by A. P. Michelson against the City of Sacramento. From a judgment for plaintiff, the City appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Archibald Yell, of Sacramento, for appellant. J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, Wm. B. Bosley, of San Francisco, and L. T. Hatfield, of Sacramento, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The charter of Sacramento provides that no ordinance shall take effect until 30 days after its passage, except a tax ordinance and "except an ordinance for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, which contains a statement of its urgency and is passed by a four-fifths vote of the city commission." Section 270, Stats. Sp. Sess. 1911, p. 400. On June 30, 1915, the commission passed an ordinance, section 30 of which declared that it was for the immediate preservation of the public safety, and a matter of urgency, and should take effect 15 days after its passage. On July 15, 1915, the plaintiff sued to enjoin the city from enforcing said ordinance on the ground that there was no urgency and that the declaration that there was an urgency when none existed had the effect of making the ordinance void. On July 28, 1915, the court made a preliminary order of injunction in the case purporting to restrain the city from enforcing the ordinance until further order.

[1] The law of the case is settled by the decision of this court in the Hoffman Case, 155 Cal. 120, 99 Pac. 517, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75, with which we are entirely satisfied, holding, with respect to Los Angeles, having an identical provision in its charter, that the effect of declaring an urgency when there was none is not to avoid the ordinance, but merely to postpone the taking effect thereof until the period of 30 days has elapsed.

[2] We are, however, without power to determine the validity of the preliminary injunction in this case, for no effectual appeal has been taken. The record contains a notice to the clerk to prepare a record under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. This notice states that the defendant desires to appeal, but nowhere declares that it does appeal. No other notice was given. The case comes within the decisions in Boling v. Alton, 162 Cal. 297, 122 Pac. 461; Marcucci v. Vowinkel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 Pac. 430; and Estate of Faber, 168 Cal. 492, 143 Pac. 737, holding that such a notice is ineffectual to constitute an appeal. The matter is of slight importance since the case is still pending on the merits, and the court below is not bound by its preliminary order.

The appeal is dismissed.

REAS v. CLEMENCE et al. (L. A. 3773.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1916.)

1. PARTITION — RECEIVER — PROPRIETY OF APPOINTMENT.

In a partition suit by plaintiff against a number of tenants in common with him of land and a well and pumping plant, where it did not appear that any of the tenants in common was in exclusive possession of the plant, or preventing any other tenant from operating the same, there being nothing to indicate that plaintiff was not able to operate the plant for his own use and thereby obtain whatever water he desired, appointment of a receiver was not justified by the facts that plaintiff and many defendants were dependent upon water from the pumping plant for irrigation, that the owners of the tract could not agree on the management and operation of the plant, that it had not been operated during the 10 days preceding the filing of the complaint, and that unless water was soon supplied plaintiff's crops and those of other parties would be wholly lost, since a receiver cannot be appointed where no tenant in common is attempting to oust plaintiff or in any way interfering with the use of the property or otherwise endangering his rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 147; Dec. Dig. —53.]

2. PARTITION — RECEIVER — PARTITION SUIT.

A receiver may be appointed in a partition suit whenever facts appear which justify such appointment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 147; Dec. Dig. —53.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by C. B. Reas against Victor Clemence and others, and J. W. Barnes and others. From an ex parte order appointing a receiver upon plaintiff's application, Barnes and others appeal. Order reversed.

Kendrick & Ardis, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Ben S. Hunter and J. E. Randall, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an ex parte order appointing a receiver upon the application of the plaintiff, and based solely upon the allegations of the complaint. The appellants claim that the facts stated do not justify the appointment of a receiver.

The complaint stated a cause of action for partition of a tract of land. It is alleged that the plaintiff and defendants own, as tenants in common, the land, together with the well, pumping plant, and pipe line used in connection therewith, situated upon the premises, and that they are now in possession thereof. The order appointing the receiver authorized him to take possession of the premises, operate the pumping plant, distribute the water obtained therefrom, and incur such indebtedness as should be necessary for said purposes. According to the allegations of the complaint, there are 168 persons interested as tenants in common in the land, each owning a small interest therein. The area of the land is not stated. The facts upon which the order appointing the receiver is based are that the plaintiff and many of the defendants are dependent upon the water from the aforesaid pumping plant for irrigation and domestic use; that the plaintiff has 10 acres in vegetables and fruit which must be irrigated to keep them alive, and that his only source of water is from said well and pumping plant; that the owners of the tract cannot agree among themselves for the management and operation of the pumping plant; that it had not been operated during the 10 days preceding the filing of the complaint, during which time the plaintiff and many other parties had been wholly deprived of the water for domestic use and irrigation, whereby their crops have been injured; and that they will continue to be injured and, unless water is supplied soon, will be wholly lost.

[1, 2] We do not think the facts stated justify the extraordinary remedy of the appointment of a receiver. It appears that the parties are in possession of the property, including the pumping plant, and it does not appear that any one of the tenants in common is in exclusive possession of the pumping plant, or is hindering or preventing any other tenant in common from operating the same. There is nothing to indicate that the plaintiff is not abundantly able to operate the pumping plant for his own use, or that it is so situated that he cannot do so and thereby obtain whatever water he desires. It is true that a receiver may be appointed in a partition suit whenever facts appear which justify such appointment. Goodale v. 15th Dist. Court, 56 Cal. 26. But, as that case abundantly shows, there is no precedent for the appointment of a receiver in a partition suit where no tenant in common is attempting to oust the plaintiff or is in any way interfering with his common possession and use of the property, or otherwise endangering the rights of the plaintiff therein.

The order is reversed.

The will of wife being contested by husband as revoked by her subsequent marriage to him by direct provision of Civ. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Gertrude C. Pusey, deceased. Henry F. Pusey nominated M. M. Crookshank as administrator, and the nominee applied for letters of administration. A will of decedent was offered for probate by S. H. Finley and contested by Henry F. Pusey. M. M. Crookshank appeals from an order denying his application for letters; and Henry F. Pusey appeals from the judgment sustaining the will and from an order denying his motion for new trial. Reversed.

C. D. Latourette, of Oregon City, Or., and Williams & Rutan, of Santa Ana, for appellants. Steele Finley, of Santa Ana, and E. J. Fleming and B. F. Woodard, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Henry F. Pusey, who asserts that he is the surviving husband of Gertrude C. Pusey, deceased, nominated M. M. Crookshank as administrator of her estate, which consists of property, real and personal, in Orange county. His nominee applied for letters of administration. The application was denied on the ground that Henry F. Pusey was not the surviving husband of Gertrude C. Pusey, and that she did not die intestate. A will executed by her prior to her alleged marriage to Pusey was offered for probate by S. H. Finley. This alleged will was contested by Pusey on the ground that the testatrix was his wife, and that the instrument, having been executed prior to the marriage, was revoked thereby under the law as declared by section 1300 of the Civil Code. The will was upheld on the ground that two purported divorces, apparently granted in the state of Oregon, each seemingly releasing Pusey from the bonds of matrimony, were void, and that he had never been legally married to the decedent. Both matters were heard together. M. M. Crookshank appeals from the order denying his application for letters of administration, and Henry F. Pusey prosecutes appeals from the judgment sustaining the will and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is not disputed that a ceremony of marriage between Henry F. Pusey and Gertrude C. Finley was performed by a minister of the gospel at Berkeley, Cal., on the 15th day of June, 1914, after a license in due form had been issued by the county clerk of Alameda county; that the parties to the alleged marriage immediately went to Oregon City, Or., where Mr. Pusey was engaged in business; and that they there lived together as husband and wife until the time of Mrs. Pusey's death, which occurred on October 1, 1914. The deceased left no issue, but is survived by brothers and sisters who reside in this state.

[1, 2] The proponent of the will offered in evidence the judgment rolls and some other papers in two cases, tried in the circuit court of the county of Clackamas, state of Oregon, and entitled, respectively, "Henry Franklin Pusey v. Julia Pusey," and "Kittie E. Pusey v. F. H. Pusey." The judgment in the first case was rendered on November 13, 1893, and in the second suit the decree was given on May 7, 1907. At the time of the hearing herein more than 20 years had elapsed since the rendering of the first decree of divorce, and more than 7 years had followed that in the second action. Respondent produced no evidence tending to show whether or not Julia Pusey or Kittie E. Pusey was alive at the date of the marriage of Henry Franklin Pusey to Gertrude C. Finley. It was therefore error on the part of the probate court to find that the said marriage was invalid, no matter whether or not the purported divorces granted in Oregon were or either of them was void for any technical reasons, because it is well settled in this state that when a marriage has been shown in evidence, the law raises a strong presumption of its legality, casting the burden of proof upon the person attacking it, and requiring him to show that it is illegal and void. This burden was not met in the matters at bar.

This subject has been so recently and so thoroughly discussed in the opinion of this court written by Mr. Chief Justice Angellotti, in the case of Wilcox v. Wilcox, 155 Pac. 95, that we need not devote any further space to it. That case and the authorities cited in the opinion furnish complete support to the conclusion which we have reached in relation to the appeals now before us.

The judgment and the two orders from which these appeals are prosecuted are reversed.

BRANDT BROS. v. FRESNO HOTEL CO.
et al. (S. F. 6915.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 25, 1916.)

MECHANICS' LIENS $\Leftrightarrow$ 281(4) — REASONABLE VALUE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that, pursuant to contract between subcontractor and contractor that 75 per cent. of the value of the work done and materials furnished by the subcontractor was to be paid for each month, and that the estimates of these values were to be adjudged by the architect, the subcontractor each month put in bills, so adjudged by the architect, and received payments thereon without complaint, held sufficient to sustain a finding that the reasonable value was no more, as against contention of subcontractor seeking mechanic's lien for reasonable value of its work and material; the contract between owner and contractor having been void and been abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 571; Dec. Dig. $\Leftrightarrow$ 281(4).]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Mechanics' lien proceeding by Brandt Bros., a copartnership composed of F. C. Brandt and another, against Fresno Hotel Company and others. From the judgment awarding lien for less than claimed, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Miller, of Stockton, and Johnston & Jones, of Fresno, for appellant. Frank H. Short, Short & Sutherland, and F. E. Cook, all of Fresno (Carl E. Lindsay, of Fresno, of counsel), for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The Fresno Hotel Company entered into a contract with H. C. Farley for the erection of a hotel, on property belonging to the Hotel Company in the city of Fresno, for the sum of $199,500. Plaintiff contracted with Farley to do all the plumbing, ventilating, steam heating, etc., for the aggregate sum of $29,800, payments to be made at the rate of 75 per cent. of the value of the work installed each month. Much work was done, when finally Farley abandoned his contract. At the time of this abandonment plaintiff had presented bills month by month, itemizing the amount and value of the labor performed and materials furnished during the preceding month. The value of the amount of the work done and materials furnished by plaintiff as evidenced by its own bills was $14,532.30, with extra work amounting to $320.35, or a total of $14,852.65. There had been paid 75 per cent. of this, or the sum of $9,267.62. The court awarded Brandt Bros. a lien for the difference, amounting to $5,585.65.

The court held the original contract between the owner and Farley to be void for reasons not here under consideration. Appellant's contention is that under section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, as it read at the time of this trial it was entitled to the reasonable value "of the labor and materials furnished," notwithstanding its contract; that this value was not the value evidenced by its bills; that its bills were evidences merely of the "wholesale" cost; and that as a retailer in plumbers' supplies and work it was entitled to an addition of at least 20 per cent. above the amount of the bills presented and allowed. Appellant argues that the evidence shows that this added charge of from 20 to 35 per cent. over the wholesale price is reasonable and in accordance with the current course of business, and that the court should have awarded it this increased amount accordingly.

But, narrowing this consideration to the single proposition of conflicting evidence, it cannot be said that the court's finding of the reasonable value upon which it based its award is unsupported by the evidence, and if it be supported by the evidence there is an end to appellant's complaint. That evidence, as above outlined, indicates that month by month this appellant presented its bills, showing the reasonable value of the work performed and materials furnished. In addition to this the claim of lien and the complaint show, in accordance with the actual transaction between appellant and Farley, that 75 per cent. of the value of the labor done and material furnished were to be paid for each month. Moreover, the estimates of these values were by the terms of the contract to be adjudged by the architect, and they were so adjudged, and appellant accepted them uncomplainingly until at the time of this trial, when he seeks to recover 20 per cent more, not only more than it had contracted for, but more than it had declared month by month was the value of its work and material.

The judgment appealed from so far as concerns the present ground of attack on it is therefore affirmed.

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act against the W. R. Rideout Company, to recover compensation for the death of Francisco Coelho. From an award of compensation the W. R. Rideout Company brings certiorari proceedings. Award confirmed.

O'Neill & O'Neill, of Oakland, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Certiorari to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding compensation for the death of one Francisco Coelho who, on June 27, 1914, fell from a barge which was being towed up the Oakland estuary and was drowned. Coelho was a deck hand on a barge operated by the W. R. Rideout Company. His duties consisted in helping to load and unload the barge. On the day in question he went to work in San Francisco at 6 o'clock, and shortly after that hour the barge was started on its trip to Oakland. Coelho had no duties to perform during the voyage. There was a house provided for the men on board the barge, and the evidence tended to show that some of them were in that place amusing themselves by playing cards during the trip. There was testimony to the fact that a breeze was blowing, but nothing to indicate that the weather was unusually stormy. Some of the witnesses said that the bay and the estuary were "a little rough," but explained that the disturbance of the water was about that which might result from the passing of a steamer. Set into the deck were six or seven posts each $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet high and 12 or 15 inches from the edge of the barge. After the barge had entered the estuary, one of the men went out on deck to get the lunch baskets for himself and his fellow workmen. He observed Coelho leaning against one of the posts. He was, as this man testified, "inside of the post," meaning doubtless on the side of the post farthest from the edge of the barge. Coelho was apparently asleep. The man, Rodrigues, pulled Coelho's coat and said: "Frank, you crazy? Come on inside." To which Coelho answered: "No. Leave me alone." Rodrigues then left him, and he was never again seen alive. His body was afterwards washed ashore at a point near the place where the conversation between Rodrigues and Coelho took place. The majority of the Industrial Accident Commission found that Coelho's death was accidental; that it happened while he was performing a service growing out of incidental to and in the course of his employment, and was not caused by the willful misconduct or intoxication of the employé. There was an attempt at the hearing before the commission to prove that Coelho was intoxicated, but it was without success, and the finding that death was not due to intoxication was the only one proper under the circumstances.

[1] Petitioner insists that Coelho was violating a well-established rule by which the employés were required to remain in the house or cabin of the barge during the trips. There was some testimony to the effect that the man in charge of the barge frequently told the other employés to stay inside of the house, but it was not shown that Coelho, who had worked on the barge but a few days, had ever been told of any rule prohibiting him from occupying any portion of the deck while the barge was in motion. On the contrary, it appears that during the very trip on which the tragedy occurred some of the men had been playing cards out on deck, and Martinez, who was in command, joined in their game. Under this condition of the evidence we may not disturb the finding that Coelho was not violating any specific rule of his employer by leaning against the stout post or bitt.

[2-4] Nor can we say that his position was so perilous that he displayed a spirit of bravado and reckless foolhardiness by occupying it. Taking the trip from San Francisco to Oakland on that barge, so that upon arrival at the latter city he might be ready to assist in removing the cargo, was a part of Coelho's duty. Therefore he was in the course of his employment when the accident occurred if he was not either recklessly or in defiance of orders occupying a place of great peril. While his conduct was not careful and was not characterized by such caution as would be entirely commendable in one afloat upon such a craft, we cannot say that it amounted to willful misconduct.

There is some suggestion on the part of the petitioner that it was incumbent upon the applicant before the commission to negative the possibility of suicide. While the burden of proof is upon the applicant, it is not necessary that every possibility of death by other than accidental means should be negatived. The circumstances in evidence are entirely consistent with death by accident, and there is no word of testimony tending to suggest either suicide or homicide. Without such evidence the claimant was entitled to the presumption that a sane man probably would not commit suicide. There was no showing and no attempt to prove that Coelho was laboring under any great mental strain. The finding of death by accident was therefore fully sustained.

As Coelho was going on his employer's business by the very conveyance furnished by the employer for that purpose, there can be no question of the correctness of the finding that the accident occurred in the course of and arose out of his employment. In re Donovan, 217 Mass. 76, 104 N. E. 431, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 778.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by A. E. Meyer and wife against the McNutt Hospital. From judgment for plaintiffs, and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Maxwell McNutt, Joseph C. Meyerstein, and Asher, Meyerstein & McNutt, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Wilder Wight, of Oakland, and I. F. Chapman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiffs sued on account of injuries caused, as alleged, by the carelessness of defendant's employes in allowing Bessie Meyer to be badly burned upon the legs by a hot water bottle while she was unconscious from the effects of an anæsthetic administered to her before a surgical operation was performed upon her. A. E. Meyer is the husband of Bessie Meyer. Judgment for $750 was given in favor of plaintiffs, and defendant appeals therefrom, as well as from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

[1-4] It appears from the evidence that Mrs. Meyer, upon the advice of her physician, went to the defendant's hospital. She was put to bed; subsequently was taken to the operating room; was placed under an anæsthetic; was subjected to an operation; and did not regain consciousness until after she had been returned to her bed. Mrs. Meyer testified that there were no burns or injuries of any sort upon her legs when she entered the hospital, nor up to the time when she lost consciousness. When she regained her senses she suffered pain and complained to her nurse, who found blisters upon the patient's legs. The injuries were treated as burns usually are and yielded to the treatment. The surgeon who performed the operation testified that she was not burned while in his presence; and, while there was no direct testimony to the effect that any servant of McNutt Hospital had applied hot water bags or any other instrumentality to produce the injuries upon Mrs. Meyer, we think the jury was justified in determining from all of the circumstances that the burns were inflicted while the patient was unconscious and under the exclusive care of defendant's nurses. The nature of the injuries themselves tends strongly to support this conclusion. Areas of 24 square inches on one leg and 15 on the other were affected, and it seems hardly possible that one could be so burned while conscious without realizing it. Negligence like almost any other fact may be established by circumstantial evidence. 29 Cyc. 622. Miss Smith, a nurse, who had charge of Mrs. Meyer before and after the operation, testified that sometimes hot water bags were put in the beds of patients before they were brought back from the operating room. This testimony was given upon cross-examination over defendant's objection. Dr. Johansen, after like objection, testified that within his experience it was customary to have the bed warmed, and that he had abundant experience. He said that a bed was usually warmed by using hot water bottles. Defendant assigns as error the rulings of the court in admitting this testimony. In the examination of Dr. Johansen plaintiff was clearly entitled to cross-examine regarding custom, for the physician had testified, as a witness for the defendant, that unless a collapse occurred, there was no necessity for making hot or cold applications to the patient. The evident purpose of such testimony was to furnish counsel for defendant with the argument that, as no reason for applying heat to Mrs. Meyer's body existed, probably no hot water bottle was used. It was clearly competent, therefore, for plaintiff to prove by this hostile witness that in spite of the lack of necessity for hot applications, they were, as matter of fact, generally used. In the direct testimony of Miss Smith she had said that she put no hot water bag or anything of the sort in Mrs. Meyer's bed. It was proper for counsel to cross-examine her upon the custom of the hospital with reference to warming beds. Such questioning was allowable for the purpose of testing the probability of her statement that in this case no artificial heat had been applied to the patient.

[5] The doctrine res ipsa loquitur is properly applied to the facts of this case. The patient was unconscious. Under its contract with her the defendant corporation owed her a duty of protection which was violated by the use of an instrumentality which produced the painful results which were made manifest when she came out from the influence of the anæsthetic. Proof of the accident carried with it the presumption of negligence. Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549-555, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146; Housel v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 167 Cal. 245, 139 Pac. 73, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1105, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 665. And this is the rule whether the liability be ascribed to the carelessness of experienced nurses or to defendant's negligence in selecting nurses who were not competent. That is the true rule as announced in Adams v. University Hospital, 122 Mo. App. 675, 99 S. W. 453, a case very like the one at bar.

No other assignments of alleged error require notice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS $\S$ 37(1)—ALTERATION—SETTING ASIDE—COMPLAINT.

The complaint for restoration of territory, by ordinance of the county board of supervisors taken from plaintiff school district and attached to defendant school district, does not sufficiently contradict the presumption that the board acted with authority and according to proper procedure, it merely alleging its act was illegal and without authority of law and in excess of power, but not specifying how any jurisdiction elements were missing, and not showing that it did not act according to provisions of Pol. Code, $\S$ 1576, and, while alleging that a majority of the heads of families in plaintiff district protested, not showing that any of protestants resided in the territory taken.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Geo. D. Murray, Judge.

Action by the Worthington School District against the Eureka School District. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. M. Frost and A. J. Monroe, both of Eureka, for appellant. P. H. Ryan and A. W. Hill, both of Eureka, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant demurred successfully to plaintiff's amended complaint, and the latter, failing to file a new pleading within the time allowed by the court, an order was made dismissing the action, and judgment in favor of defendant was entered accordingly. From said judgment plaintiff appeals.

Both parties to the action are school districts, having adjoining territories. In the amended complaint it was alleged that on November 14, 1912, the board of supervisors of Humboldt county, in which both districts are situated, passed an ordinance, whereby said board "took from" the Worthington school district and attached to the Eureka school district a certain described area. It was further averred in said amended complaint that prior to the passing of the ordinance changing the boundaries of the districts "a majority of the resident taxpayers and heads of families residing within said Worthington school district filed a remonstrance and protest with said board of supervisors, remonstrating and protesting against said change being made, and appeared before said board of supervisors and protested and remonstrated against the making of said change of the said boundaries of said school district," but that, notwithstanding these protests and remonstrances, the board of supervisors "took said premises" from the territory of the Worthington district and attached them to Eureka school district. There was further pleading that the territory so taken was less than two miles from the schoolhouse of the Worthington district, that no part of it had ever been any portion of Eureka district, and that the Worthington district had been injured by the act of the board of supervisors because of decreased daily attendance upon its school sessions, by reason of consequent loss of school funds, and also because of diminution of taxable property in the Worthington district. The prayer was for annulment of the ordinance, the restoration of the former boundaries of Worthington school district, and that the Eureka district be enjoined from exercising any control over the disputed territory.

[1] The demurrer was both general and special, and was properly sustained. There is an averment in the amended complaint that the board of supervisors "took" certain territory from one district and annexed it to the other, but there is no statement regarding the procedure followed. It is a presumption of law that legislative bodies act with authority and in accordance with proper procedure, and there is no statement that sufficiently contradicts such presumption. It is alleged that the act of the board was "illegal and without authority of law," was without jurisdiction and in excess of power, but the pleading does not specify how any jurisdictional elements were missing from the acts of the board. The county legislators may have acted in strict compliance with section 1576 of the Political Code. Nothing to contradict such a possibility is set up in the pleading. There is no allegation that the supervisors acted upon an insufficient petition nor any averment in which their failure to comply with the law is in any manner specified. There is an allegation that a majority of the heads of families in the Worthington district protested, but there is no statement that any number of the persons so protesting resided in the territory taken from that district.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Emma C. Lee and husband against Alexander Levison and others. The action was dismissed as to defendants other than Alexander Levison and National Surety Company of New York, and as to them the court granted a nonsuit. From such judgment and from order denying motion for new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Cannon, of San Francisco, for appellants. Heller, Powers & Ehrman and M. H. Wascerwitz, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Action to recover damages for malicious prosecution of Emma C. Lee on a charge of embezzlement. The trial court granted a nonsuit on the motions of Alexander Levison and National Surety Company of New York. The action was dismissed as to the other defendants. From the judgment following the nonsuit and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, Emma C. Lee and H. Lee (her husband) appeal.

The Levisons and Mary Ostroski owned an apartment house, and in July, 1908, Mr. Levison employed Mrs. Lee as manager thereof and as housekeeper. A few months later the National Surety Company executed a bond to Mr. Levison indemnifying him against loss on account of any personal dishonesty of Mrs. Lee "amounting to larceny or embezzlement." As manager Mrs. Lee collected the rents, made certain expenditures, and accounted monthly to Mr. Levison. On April 19, 1909, Mr. Levison wrote her that beginning May 1st of that year he preferred to pay all bills of the apartment house at his office. He instructed her to get together and send to him any unpaid bills up to that time. She was authorized to pay bills for removing garbage and other similar items of less than $5, making reports of such expenditures at the next settlement with him. Plaintiff continued her practice of rendering monthly accounts until her discharge, which occurred on June 11, 1909. After her discharge difficulties arose between Mrs. Lee and Mr. Levison because of their disagreement regarding the balance of their accounts and also because of her refusal to vacate the premises. She did leave the apartment house, after an interview with some one connected with the district attorney's office. Mr. Levison then authorized Mr. J. W. Bernstein, who had acted as his broker in obtaining the surety bond, to take up with the surety company Mrs. Lee's alleged default in payment of sums due to the owners of the apartment house. Mr. Bernstein examined her books and after a conference with her wrote to the surety company a letter in which he charged that she had collected and failed to account for various rents, amounting in the aggregate to $158. He also stated that there were "other irregularities" which Mr. Levison was investigating. After a personal interview between Mr. Bernstein and the manager of the surety company the matter was turned over to Mr. Sayers, adjuster for that corporation, and he with Mr. Bernstein conducted the subsequent negotiations with Mrs. Lee. In their conferences Mrs. Lee submitted an itemized demand for credits amounting to something more than $200. About half of this sum was made up of alleged expenditures made after May 1, 1909, of amounts greater than $5. Plaintiff told Mr. Sayers and Mr. Bernstein that she had made payments of all of the sums shown by her itemized bill. Mr. Levison disallowed certain of these charges and Mr. Bernstein and Mr. Sayers demanded payment from Mrs. Lee of $51.25, asserting that she owed Mr. Levison that balance. She declined to settle on the proposed terms. Mr. Sayers then told Mr. Bernstein to have Mrs. Lee arrested. It was in evidence that Mr. Levison, informed of the proposed arrest, refused to sanction it or to have anything to do with it. However, Mr. Bernstein swore to a complaint, charging Mrs. Lee with embezzlement of $32.50. She was tried and acquitted.

Appellant contends that Mr. Sayers and Mr. Bernstein acted within the scope of their agencies respectively for the surety company and the owners of the apartment house; that there was no "probable cause" for believing Mrs. Lee guilty of embezzlement; and that Mrs. Lee's arrest was inspired by malice on the part of all concerned in it. We will not discuss the questions of agency, because we believe that, even assuming the correctness of appellants' theories on that subject, they failed at the trial to establish want of "probable cause" for the arrest and the existence of malice on the part of those persons who caused it.

[1] It is contended by appellants that since Mrs. Lee's retention of moneys collected by her was open and with claim of right, there was no basis for a charge of embezzlement. Section 511, Pen. Code. But while it is true that Mrs. Lee openly charged her employers with certain sums when she did submit an alleged accounting, the collected funds were retained to offset demands against them which should have been included, if genuine, in previous monthly accounts. A reasonable man might well conclude that some of the offsets were fabricated. For example, the item "Paid * * * Miss Phillips tending door for 3 months $30," might well create such a suspicion as might also the item of $9 charged for car fare and an alleged indebtedness for "cleaning curtains—9 months." There were other charges which were open to a like suspicion regarding their genuineness, but which we will not take time to review in detail. It is incumbent upon the plaintiff in a case of this sort to prove both malice and want of probable cause. The burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs in the action at bar to establish both of these elements of their alleged cause of action. Davis v. Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 127 Cal. 312-319, 57 Pac. 764, 59 Pac. 698; Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 217-221; Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644-656; Anderson v. Coleman, 53 Cal. 188.

[2] This court from the earliest history of the state has adopted the definition for "probable cause" derived from the discussion in Greenleaf's treatise on Evidence: "Probable cause is a suspicion founded upon circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the charge is true." 2 Greenleaf, §§ 453-457.

[3] While there is some conflict in the testimony there is no denial of the receipt by Mrs. Lee of the letter forbidding the expenditure of sums greater than $5 by her on account of the management of the apartment house, nor of the fact that she made monthly reports nor of the demands made by her after her discharge for items of indebtedness greater than $5 each, which, if proper charges, should have appeared in her monthly reports. In other words, the essentials were undisputed and the court properly determined, as matter of law, that the facts did not establish want of probable cause.

[4] Under the circumstances revealed the court was justified in granting the motion for nonsuit. Booraem v. Potter Hotel Co., 154 Cal. 99, 97 Pac. 65. This conclusion relieves us of the necessity of discussing the question of malice attributed to defendants, although we are of the opinion that plaintiff failed to show the existence of malice on the part of any of them.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the guardianship of Lew Choy Foon, a minor. From an order of appointment, the mother appeals. Affirmed.

Harding & Monroe, of San Francisco, for appellant. Costello & Costello, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Yoke Won, mother of a minor child, Lew Choy Foon, appeals from an order appointing Lew Get and Mar Shee guardians of the person of said minor.

[1] The appellant insists that there was no evidence to support the finding that the mother was an unfit person to have the custody of the child, and that the unfitness of Lew Get and his wife, Mar Shee, was amply established. An examination of the record discloses a sharp conflict of evidence on almost every material point in issue. Certain matters, however, appear without denial. One is that when the child was born the mother was living the life of a prostitute. There was evidence tending to show that she was a slave girl and an unwilling inmate of the brothel in which her baby was born. It is undisputed that Mar Shee took the baby when she was three days old; that ever since that time the little girl has lived with Lew Get and Mar Shee; that they have provided for her; that the foster parents have been married according to American custom since the child went to live with them; and that they have exhibited at all times a deep affection for the little one. There was evidence tending to show that after living for some time in the house in which her baby had been born, Yoke Won was redeemed by a man named Lee Suey, and after living with him as his second wife or concubine for some time, part of that period away from San Francisco, she heard of the Presbyterian Mission, situated at No. 920 Sacramento street, in the city and county of San Francisco. She took refuge there, and resided at the mission at the time when the guardianship matter was heard.

It was undisputed that the mother was possessed of no means of her own, but the charitable people in charge of the mission were willing to take the child until such time as the mother might marry some good man or secure some employment whereby she might support herself and the little girl. It is evident that Miss Cameron, the superintendent of the Presbyterian Mission, sincerely believed in the full and permanent reformation of Yoke Won and in the unworthiness of the foster parents. Moved by such belief, she sought to rescue the little one from such environment, but it was the peculiar function of the learned judge of the superior court before whom the hearing took place to pass upon the questions of fact in dispute upon which there was a conflict of testimony, and we cannot, of course, interfere with his conclusions, adopted after a full and patient hearing of the evidence. It would be hard to find in any record a more radical conflict. According to witnesses who appeared on behalf of the mother, Lew Get and Mar Shee were absolutely unworthy and unfit to be intrusted with the care and nurture of a little girl. On the other hand, witnesses produced by the petitioner described Lew Get as a prosperous merchant of good character, his wife as an excellent woman, and their home as one of refinement. Indeed, there seems to have been no doubt of the ample material comforts which they were able to give the child, but the mother and her sponsors were apparently concerned about the moral welfare of the little one. This question was, as we have indicated, one which the lower court could solve, but one which we cannot determine by reference to the conflicting evidence.

[2] But we are reminded of this court's frequent refusals to deprive parents of the custody of children merely because of comparative poverty, and it is argued that this young mother, rescued from a life of degradation, should be permitted to rear her daughter even though she could not give the child the material comforts bestowed by Lew Get and Mar Shee. This court has resolutely refused to deprive parents of their children upon considerations of comparative luxury or poverty, but the learned judge of the superior court, who had an opportunity to observe the young mother and to hear her testimony and that of the other witnesses, was in a position to decide whether or not her reformation was complete. He could, and doubtless did, also weigh the comparative benefit to the child, in respect to her temporal, mental, and moral welfare, which might result from residence in an eleemosynary institution or a continuance of the life with the foster parents. This was his duty under section 246 of the Civil Code, and he resolved the question before him in favor of the petitioners.

[3] There is a square conflict of evidence on the question of abandonment. The mother testified that the baby was given to Mar Shee by the keeper of the house in which she resided, and that she, being a slave girl, had no voice in the matter. Mar Shee, on the contrary, testified that the young mother gave her the child and asked her to raise it. She promised to take and support the infant. Dr. Lafontaine testified she attended Yoke Won when the child was born. The mother refused to have anything to do with the infant, would not nurse it, and said, in Chinese, "I don't like it." There was also evidence to the effect that while she was living with Lee Suey the mother made no effort to see her child, although she was on friendly terms with Lew Get and Mar Shee. This testimony was sufficient to support the finding of the court that the minor was abandoned and cast off by the mother.

[4] Appellant introduced in evidence an opinion written by the learned judge of the juvenile court in a proceeding to have Lew Choy Foon declared an abandoned child. He held that she was not an abandoned child, but such decision was not binding upon the superior court in a subsequent proceeding in guardianship. In re Guardianship of Michels, 170 Cal. 339, 149 Pac. 587.

It follows that the order from which the appeal is taken must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by W. P. Robinson against Frank Otis, as Mayor of the City of Alameda, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. F. St. Sure, of Alameda, for appellants. J. A. Elston, of Berkeley, and George Clark, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment awarding a writ of mandate. The respondent herein petitioned the superior court of the county of Alameda for a writ of mandamus commanding the mayor and members of the council of said city of Alameda to issue a permit to him to move a certain building over the streets of the city. The petition shows that there exists an ordinance of the city of Alameda regulating the moving of buildings upon its streets, which in substance provides for the issuance of a permit upon written application showing the consent of certain property owners, the filing of a bond, and the character of building to be removed, and prohibits such removal in the absence of the required permission. The plaintiff made application, and the matter came on for hearing in regular session of the council; and after receiving evidence for and against the issuance of the permit the council denied the application, whereupon plaintiff filed his petition for the writ aforesaid. Defendants demurred to the petition, and upon the overruling of such demurrer declined to answer, whereupon judgment was entered against them, awarding to the plaintiff the writ of mandamus as prayed for. From this judgment, the defendants appeal.

The only questions involved in the appeal are, whether or not the council had the power to enact the ordinance in question, and if, having such power, its refusal to issue a permit was such an abuse of discretion as to warrant the granting of the relief here sought.

[1] The city of Alameda by its charter is given authority as a municipal corporation to manage and control the streets, roads and highways, and to permit, regulate or prohibit the placing of obstructions thereon, and to ordain, make and enforce within the limits of the city all necessary, police, sanitary and other laws and regulations. Stats. 1907, p. 1059; Const. art. 11, § 11. Under this grant of power there can be no question but that the city has the right to pass an ordinance of the character mentioned. The authority of municipalities to enact ordinances under its police power has received consideration in a great many cases in numerous jurisdictions. It would be a useless task to review those authorities, and a mere reference to a case where the power was exercised under facts similar to those here will be sufficient. In Eureka City v. Wilson, 15 Utah, 53, 48 Pac. 41, an ordinance required the issuance of a permit for the removal of buildings, and it was held that the city council could prohibit by ordinance the moving of a building into and upon the streets of a municipality without first obtaining a permit, and that such right comes within the police power of the state. This case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Wilson v. Eureka City, 173 U. S. 32, 19 Sup. Ct. 317, 43 L. Ed. 603.

[2] Having the power to pass the ordinance, it only remains to be determined whether or not the permit in this instance was rightfully refused. A certain discretion in matters of this character must necessarily be vested in the governing body of a municipality; and its conclusion on the subject, in the absence of fraud or circumstances disclosing a manifest abuse of such discretion, is conclusive and not open to question by the courts. Vanderhurst v. Tholcke, 113 Cal. 147, 45 Pac. 266, 35 L. R. A. 267. No such abuse of discretion is here shown. The council had a public hearing, and having considered the evidence denied the application; and it cannot be said that it arbitrarily or dishonestly exercised its power. On the contrary, there is nothing contained in the record to show but that it acted with good motives and in the interests of the public welfare.

The judgment is reversed.

Robert J. Weir was convicted of a crime, and from the judgment and order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

R. W. Hays and B. W. Gearhart, both of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. [1] In charging the commission of the felony defined by section 476a of the Penal Code it is not essential to a statement of the facts constituting such offense that the information should allege that the check drawn by the person charged with the offense was presented to the bank. Such in effect was the ruling in the case of People v. Mohr, 157 Cal. 732, 109 Pac. 476. It follows logically that if such fact was not required to be pleaded against the defendant, it was not necessary to be established against him in order to secure and sustain his conviction.

[2] The criminal intent of the defendant when making and drawing the check in question was an essential element of the offense with which he was charged; and he admitting the act but defending in part upon the ground that it was free from felonious intent, proof of the commission of similar acts, even though they be independent and disconnected, and were committed either before or after the perpetration of the crime charged, was relevant and competent for the purpose of showing guilty intent. People v. King, 23 Cal. App. 259, 137 Pac. 1076.

The evidence upon the whole sustains the verdict and judgment. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

8. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 300(3)—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTION.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, an instruction that, to justify a person for attempting to kill another on the ground of self-defense, the attempt must be made under the well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary for such person to kill the other to save himself from great bodily harm, the danger being present, apparent, and imminent, was not improper as declaring that it need appear that it was absolutely necessary for the assaulted person to resort to the means of self-defense adopted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Mason Bradfield was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Earl Rogers and Veitch & Richardson, all of Los Angeles, E. E. Moss, of Ventura, and O. G. Kuklinski and Milton M. Cohen, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. The defendant was charged by the information of the district attorney with having, on the 1st day of July, 1915, committed an assault with a deadly weapon with the intent to murder George J. Henley. The jury by its verdict convicted the defendant of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon only. This appeal is taken from the judgment of the court which followed, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The alleged assault occurred in the daytime on a street in the town of Fillmore, Ventura county. The complainant Henley occupied a tract of land in a canyon near Fillmore, across which and leading to more remote sections of the mountains was a road. This road was located on the ground which Henley claimed to own, and he objected to persons traveling over it without first paying for the privilege. A corporation of which defendant was manager or superintendent was operating, either for water or oil, at a point above the Henley place. In order to reach the land of the corporation it was necessary, or at least desirable, to travel over the Henley road. Henley objecting, a suit was brought, and finally a stipulation was made by which the right to travel upon this road was conceded to the corporation. Henley either raised some question about this right so conferred later, or at least insisted that the privilege granted be strictly construed as not allowing the corporation or its agents upon any portion of the ground claimed by him outside of the roadway. While Henley and the appellant had been friends in former years, this dispute over the right to use the road engendered some bad feeling. According to the claim of appellant, which is given color by the evidence, Henley attributed to Bradfield all of the difficulty which he had had with the corporation which was under the management of Bradfield. At a time about three years prior to the occasion of the assault, Henley met Bradfield as the latter was traveling down the canyon on the road, and his attitude at that time was abusive and threatening. However, he made no attack upon Bradfield and showed no weapons. On this occasion Bradfield testified that while he was engaged with his parley with Henley he glanced over by a building, and there saw Mrs. Henley armed with a double-barreled shotgun, which was leveled in his direction. Bradfield testified that he walked about so as to keep Henley between him and the gun until a man named Snow drove down, when he (Bradfield) left the canyon, to which he had never returned. The corporation, however, through their agents and under the direction of Bradfield, had continued to prosecute some work on their property above the Henley place. As before mentioned, this wordy encounter took place three years prior to the date when the alleged assault was committed.

On the 1st day of July, 1915, Henley came to the town of Fillmore to transact some business. He testified that he went to the office of the justice of the peace to look up the question of his rights regarding trespassers on his property, and later walked up the street; that in front of a real estate office, where Bradfield's company had its headquarters, he saw Bradfield; that Bradfield bowed, and that Henley returned the salutation; that Bradfield then came toward him; that he (Henley) stopped, thinking that Bradfield wanted to talk with him, and that he addressed Bradfield, asking him how he was getting along and where he was surveying at that time.

Henley testified that he noticed some expression passing over the face of Bradfield, and that he ran his eyes up and down the form of the latter; that he noticed a motion, and as he raised his eyes he found that he was looking into a gun which Bradfield held aimed at him; that the next expression of Bradfield was, "Are you heeled?" that he (Henley) turned and said "No," and that as he turned he bowed his head, thinking that he was to receive a shot; that one shot was fired, striking him back of the shoulder, and then after a little intermission two more shots were fired, both of which took effect in his back; that he had started to go away as soon as he saw the gun in the hand of Bradfield, but that as he swung around and started, all of the shots had been fired. Henley testified that he was totally unarmed, except for a pocketknife, which was in his pocket, and none of the several witnesses, who were almost immediately at the scene of the shooting, saw any weapon, although Bradfield, the defendant, made the claim that Henley was carrying a gun. Henley, after being shot, staggered down the street some little distance, and then fell to the ground from loss of blood. He was immediately picked up and attended by a physician. This physician testified that he found two wounds of entrance in the man's back; one bullet had entered at an oblique angle at about the center of the left shoulder blade and proceeded across the man's back under the skin and lodged at some point over the right shoulder blade. Another bullet had entered at the lower tip of the right shoulder blade, had progressed to the right and around the man's body and came out in front. A number of blood vessels were severed by the bullet which occasioned this last wound, and profuse bleeding resulted. What appears to have been the first bullet fired did not enter the body of Henley, but passed through his clothing at the back from left to right.

The appellant, in giving his version of the shooting, testified that on the day in question Henley passed his office several times and motioned for him (Bradfield) to come out; that, being busy, he paid no attention at first, but upon the second or third time that Henley passed he did go out and speak to him; that Henley asked him why he did not come up into the canyon any more, and upon his replying that he had no occasion to, that he could have what he needed done by others, Henley had cursed him and told him he was afraid to go into the canyon; that Henley had made some motion which disclosed to the view of appellant the butt of a revolver in Henley's pocket; that appellant, knowing of Henley's proficiency both in the handling of a gun and knife, considered that he was about to be attacked, and drew his own weapon and fired. He testified that he fired three shots in rapid succession, aiming at the right shoulder blade of Henley, with the idea of "crippling" him only. He did not contend that Henley had actually drawn a revolver, and at one point in his testimony said Henley reached for a gun, and at another point said that he was "looking for a knife from him." When asked as to whether he saw the revolver of Henley again that day, he said that he thought that he saw one of the witnesses who testified in the case take the gun from Henley after the latter had staggered away down the street. The witness referred to gave no testimony as to finding any gun upon or in the hands of Henley.

[1, 2] Of course, it is enough to say that wherever there was a conflict of testimony the jury had the right to exclusively judge as to the fact. There was a great deal of testimony admitted touching the statements made by Henley to various persons respecting his rights in the canyon and his hostile feeling toward those who contended for the privilege of passing over his property. This testimony was introduced as tending to show ground for a reasonable fear in the mind of the appellant that at the time of the alleged assault he believed his life to be in danger, or that he was likely to suffer great bodily injury at the hands of Henley. Counsel for appellant at great length argue that the trial judge committed error prejudicial to the defendant when he struck out certain testimony of Bradfield, and in the giving of an instruction touching the question of prior threats made by a person who is afterwards injured at the hands of the one threatened. Bradfield testified that the man Snow, who had approached at the time of his wordy encounter with Henley in the canyon three years prior to the shooting, had talked to him about that occurrence. The record shows that the matter was presented in this way, Bradfield being on the witness stand:

"Q. Subsequently did Snow have a conversation in which he purported to tell you the statements made by Mr. Henley respecting you and what should have or would have happened to you on that particular morning? A. Yes; in 10 or fifteen days. Q. What did he tell you? A. He told me that Mrs. Henley had told him that George (Henley) had stopped me in the road and gave me a good roast, that I quit and got out of the canyon, and she did not think would ever come back again. Q. Did Mr. Snow tell you whether the Henley's said anything about the gun? A. Yes; she said she had her double-barreled shot-gun filled up with pieces of lead pipe. She had whittled them off, and if I had made a move of any kind she would have torn me in two."

Counsel say that they were entitled to have this testimony considered by the jury as indicating the character of Henley and the state of mind of appellant at the time of the shooting, as showing reasonable ground for the belief that the latter was about to be attacked when approached by Henley on the 1st day of July in Fillmore. It will be noted that not a word of this testimony referred to any threat made by Henley. Bradfield testified that he had, on the occasion referred to, observed the double-barreled shotgun leveled at him by Mrs. Henley, but he made no claim that Henley at that time exhibited any deadly weapon or threatened to use one. Counsel say it is "hard to realize a woman loading a shotgun with lead clippings," and likens the case to that of Kipling's grenadier who held a cocked rifle to the head of a wounded Afghan while the officer gave the injured a drink of water, in order to prevent the wounded man from shooting the officer as one had just done, and he says that Bradfield had the right to follow Mulvaney's example and take extraordinary precaution against such cruelty as would recommend a woman to load a shotgun with lead clippings. Remembering that the encounter was between Bradfield and Henley, and not Mrs. Henley, the relevancy of testimony showing what Mrs. Henley did or might do, is not apparent. We might quote a couplet by the same distinguished author to whom counsel has referred:

"When Nag, the cobra, hears the careless steps of man,
He sometimes wriggles sideways to avoid him if he can;
But his mate makes no such motion as she camps beside the trail,
For the female of the species is more deadly than the male."

The fact that the trial judge struck out this testimony on the ground that it was hearsay, in that Snow was not produced, and it was in no wise made to appear that Mrs. Henley had actually made the statements communicated, does not present error of which appellant is entitled to complain, because the testimony, as we view it, was not relevant in the aspect which the case presents.

[3, 4] The court, at the request of defendant, gave the following instruction, with the modification embodied in the phrase and word which we have shown in parentheses:

"One who has received information of threats against his life or person made by another is justified in acting more quickly and taking harsher measures for his own protection in event of assault, either actual or threatened, than would be a person who had not received such threats; and if in this case you believe from the evidence (that the prosecuting witness made threats against the defendant and) that the defendant, because of (such) threats made previously to the transaction complained of by the prosecuting witness and communicated to the defendant either by the prosecuting witness or some other person, had reasonable cause to fear greater peril in event of an altercation with the prosecuting witness than he would have otherwise, you are to take such facts and circumstances into your consideration in determining whether defendant acted in a manner in which a reasonable man would act in protecting his own life or bodily safety."

The instruction as modified, when properly analyzed, means nothing more or less than it did in the form in which the appellant presented it to the court. In that form it stated quite clearly that threats such as would furnish ground in the appellant's mind for the belief that his life or person were in danger, were those which had been "made previously * * * by the prosecuting witness." Appellant is not entitled to complain of error in an instruction which he himself has prepared and asked the court to present to the jury. An examination of other instructions offered by the defendant shows that in their phraseology it was assumed as a prerequisite that the threats which were communicated had actually been made by the prosecutor. Instruction 26, found in the clerk's transcript, contains language of that meaning. It may be conceded that it is not the law that it must appear that such threats were actually made by the prosecutor, and that it is sufficient that it has been stated to the person who acts thereon that such threats were made and that such statements were believed and relied upon by the person charged with the assault. The trial judge allowed to be shown on behalf of the defendant very fully the attitude and disposition of Henley, as manifested by his words and acts touching the question of trespassers upon the property which he claimed to own. The objections which were sustained to questions tending to further emphasize the disposition of Henley in that regard we think were in the main properly determined. The contentions urged in this direction are rather hypercritical and the argument in support thereof attenuated.

[5, 6] It is complained very earnestly that the court erred in giving this instruction to the jury:

"I instruct you that if you believe from the testimony in this cause that said defendant, Mason Bradfield, and the prosecuting witness, George J. Henley, prior to the 1st day of July, 1915, had certain difficulties and troubles, then, in that event, you are only to consider such testimony for the sole purpose of determining the state of mind of said defendant, Mason Bradfield, and said prosecuting witness, George J. Henley, at the time of the alleged assault, if any there was, and for the further purpose of showing malice, if any, the defendant had at such time."

Counsel argue that the evidence of the previous difficulties between Henley and Bradfield was to be considered for the purpose of showing malice in the mind of Henley, the prosecutor. We make no distinction between the meaning of the expressions contained in the instruction, where the court told the jury that such testimony was admissible for the purpose of determining the state of mind of the two men, and had the instruction advised the jury that such testimony should also be considered for the purpose of showing malice of Henley. By the instruction the jury was entitled to view the evidence as indicating whatever it might in the direction of explaining the whole state of mind of the two men. It was proper, too, to advise that evidence of the difficulties might be considered for the purpose of showing malice, if any, that the defendant had against the complainant, for under the charge as made, to wit, assault with intent to commit murder, malice was a material ingredient. The jury, however, did not find the defendant guilty of that crime, but convicted him of the lesser offense which involved no specific malice on his part.

[7, 8] It is also declared that the following instruction misstates the law:

"To justify a person for attempting to kill another upon the ground of self-defense, the attempt must be made under well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary for such person to kill the other at the time to save himself from great bodily harm. The danger or harm must be present, apparent, and imminent."

Counsel's whole argument on this proposition is that in proving justification for an attack it need not appear that it was absolutely necessary for the person to resort to the means adopted and kill another. The instruction does not so declare. It does state, and properly, that the person acting in self-defense and resorting to the use of a deadly weapon must believe that it is absolutely necessary for him to so act in order to justify under the law. The jury was not told that it must find as a fact that the necessity did "absolutely" exist, but only that defendant so believed. The case of People v. Webster, 13 Cal. App. 348, 109 Pac. 637, is not contrary in its holding to this conclusion. Examining the whole body of the instructions, we find that the court sedulously and with great care defined to the jury the rights of a person charged with an assault who claims to have acted in self-defense. It was fully explained that the conduct of such person was only such as would be determined by the mind of a reasonable man, and that he might act upon appearances, and that even though the danger was apparent, and not real, he would be justified.

The main contentions advanced by the appellant in his claim for a reversal have been carefully considered, and the evidence, as disclosed by the lengthy transcript, thoroughly examined. We believe that the defendant in this case has been protected by the court in his right to have a fair trial, and that the verdict of the jury is fully sustained by the evidence.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SOULE v. WYATT et al. (Civ. 1515.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 19, 1916.)

DEEDS. $\S$ 211(4) — EVIDENCE — VALIDITY — FRAUD AND UNDUE INFLUENCE.

In action by father to set aside a deed to his daughter, alleged to have been procured by fraud and misrepresentation and by undue influence upon him when feeble and incompetent, evidence that at time of making the deed he was 77 years old, feeble and suffering grievously with eye disease and heart trouble, that he had recently lost his wife and his household was broken up, that defendant falsely represented that his other children had boasted that they were going to get his property, that she promised if he made the deed to her he could sell the property at any time, and that he had repeatedly expressed his desire that his children should share equally—supported finding for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Suit by John A. Soule against Lottie M. Wyatt and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. S. Bell, of Napa, for appellants. George Clark, of San Francisco, and W. A. Anderson, of Woodland, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff commenced the action to set aside and have declared void a certain deed conveying to his daughter, Lottie M. Wyatt, one of the defendants, certain real property situated in the town of Washington, Yolo county, on the ground that:

"Said deed was procured to be executed by the said defendants through the frauds and misrepresentations of said defendants and by the undue influence exerted by the said defendants upon the said plaintiff at a time when he was enfeebled in mind and health and incompetent to make a deed or to dispose of his property," and that "plaintiff's title to said property be quieted against said defendants and each of them."

The cause was tried by the court, and plaintiff had judgment in his favor, from which defendants appeal.

The court made the following findings of fact:

"(1) The court finds all and singular the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint to be true. (2) That the attorney who prepared the deed for the signature of the plaintiff was in no manner a party to the plan under which the said defendants procured the making of said deed and the said attorney acted wholly without knowledge of the manner in which defendants did procure the making of the said deed by the said plaintiff."

Plaintiff was a pensioner of the Southern Pacific Company in 1911, residing on the premises in question in the town of Washington, sometimes called Broderick. His family consisted of his wife and grandchild, Flossie Conrad, daughter of defendant Lottie Wyatt by her first husband. When Flossie was an infant she was taken into plaintiff's family and reared as their own child. Plaintiff was 77 years old and was suffering grievously with a painful disease of the eyes and finally lost the sight of one of them. He was feeble from the infirmities of age and was afflicted with heart trouble, which at unexpected moments would cause him to lose consciousness and fall to the ground as in a fit, lying there rigid "and as though dead," as one witness described his condition. On July 13, 1911, his wife died and Flossie's mother took Flossie away to her own home at Rutherford, Napa county, and plaintiff went to the home of his son, Charles C. Soule, in Broderick. The loss of his wife, the taking from him his grandchild, Flossie, to whom he was devotedly attached, together with the excruciating pain caused by the disease of his eyes and his general weak physical condition, so affected plaintiff as to make him an object of pity and commiseration. He was ill for some time after the death of his wife. He testified:

"I lost my eyesight, then worrying about my wife and my baby" (he called Flossie "his baby") "that I thought a good deal of took away from me, and all things together made me sick; that is about all I can remember at the present. * * * Q. What effect, if any, on your feelings or your mind did the death of your wife and the breaking up of your family have? A. Well, it made me what you might say crazy, in fact I think I am so yet."

He visited his daughter, Mrs. Wyatt, occasionally for some time after his wife's death.

"Q. What took you down there, what was the cause of your going? A. Well, in the first place I didn't want to go down; I rather be at my old home, it is natural, but they took my baby away and caused me to go down there, my daughter did; thought if I would come down there I would be better off where Flossie was and so I made up my mind I would go down there; I like to be where she was so I went down and stayed there awhile and came back awhile and kept going."

The deed in question was executed on July 30, 1912, three weeks after he went to Rutherford to live with defendants. He testified as to his then physical condition as follows:

"I was pretty sick; I was weakened down, discouraged, my eyesight was failing, and I felt weak; one-half of the time I couldn't rest nights; they gave me whisky with some stuff in it to make me sleep; one thing and another, so therefore I got pretty weak for quite a while, but I got better."

Several witnesses testified to his weakened condition; that his eyes gave him great pain; that he was subject to fainting spells from heart trouble; that he constantly grieved "and was brooding" over the loss of his wife and having his granddaughter taken from him. Besides defendant Mrs. Wyatt, his children were Mrs. Annie Lindsay and two sons, Charles C. and John G. Plaintiff testified that after he came to Rutherford and before the deed was made, defendant Mrs. Wyatt told him she learned through two letters written to Mrs. Addie Barry, residing at Rutherford, sister to plaintiff's deceased wife, that his son John and Mrs. Lindsay were going to get all his property.

"She (Mrs. Wyatt) said they were going to have it all, them two, and I remarked I didn't want them to have it all. I wanted to divide it amongst the four of them."

Mrs. Barry testified that this representation by Mrs. Wyatt was false and that Mrs. Lindsay had not written any such letter. Plaintiff testified:

"Q. What did she keep saying to you? A. She say they made their brags they were going to have it all because they done the most work on it. I admitted they did, but at the same time I didn't think it was right for them to have it all. Q. What did you say on the subject of dividing your property? A. I say I wanted to divide it, want it equally divided. Q. What way? A. Each one of them to have their share. Q. Where and when did you tell her that? A. Well, about the time we were talking about it; I don't know exactly when it was. Q. But it was before the deed was made? A. It was before the deed was made. Q. Was anything said by her when you stated you wanted to divide it up among them all? A. Well, she said I couldn't do it, because they were going to have it all, Annie and John was; of course, I couldn't divide it if them two going to get it all, and I didn't like that idea. Q. Was anything said about a will? A. Yes, sir; I did. Q. What did you say? A. I said, 'Well, then I will fool them, I will make a will, then they can't get any more than the others,' and she said, 'A will can be broke.' Q. Where was her husband during the talk? A. One time we were talking about it I couldn't say at the dinner table or supper table, talking about the will, and she turned around and says to Harry—we call him Harry—'a will can be broke, can't it?' and he says, 'Yes.' That finished it for that evening. Q. At that time you were living down there? A. At that time I was living down there. Q. That was before the deed was made? A. That was before the deed was made. Q. At the time of that talk about saying a will could be broke, was anything said about a deed? A. Yes. Q. Who said it? A. She said a deed—no, he said a deed would be the best because can't break a deed. Q. What did she say, if anything? A. I don't remember she said anything, in reply to that or not at that time, but talked about it afterwards, but not at that time. * * * Q. After these talks you have referred to, was there any further talk between you and them regarding your property and disposing of it in any way? A. Why, about making the deed? Q. Yes. A. Well, she said—I said, 'Well, if a will can be broke, I would like to have Charlie and you and Flossie have a share of it, because if the rest want it all that looks kind of hog-gish to me, they so mean probably they won't get any of it.' So she says, 'Well, you can't mention Flossie because what belongs to me belongs to Flossie.' 'Then I will make it in your and Charles' name.' 'Well, you can't make it in two names, have to make it in one, make it in my name, then I can give Charlie his share.' 'What is his share?' 'Well, I will give him $1,000.' 'Well, he ought to have more than that.' 'Well, but I have to take care of you.' 'Take care of me? I don't want any care. I will go to the county hospital if the worst comes to the worst.' Q. You stated she said something about making out a deed in more than one name? A. She said you couldn't make it in more than one name. Q. Did you believe those statements? A. I believe it; yes, sir; I didn't know any better. Q. How long before you went up to Mr. Bell's office was it this talk occurred that you mentioned? A. How long before? Q. Yes. A. It might have been, well, I will say about three weeks, I don't know if it was quite as much as that, but say three weeks; I can't remember these things right up to a date. Q. How often was the matter of deeding your property talked over? A. Oh, every little while get to talking about it until at last I got tired; I say I never had anything; in fact I aint got nothing, I couldn't handle it to suit myself, I was getting tired and sick hearing them talk about it. Q. When the talk occurred or the talks occurred about the making of a deed, was there anything said regarding disposing of the property after the deed was made? A. Yes. Q. What was said? A. She says, 'Papa, you make it in my name; you know you are pretty sharp on a bargain and you can sell it any time you like and all I have got to do is sign the papers,' so, of course, I thought I could have that privilege. Q. How long before you actually signed the deed did she make that statement to you? A. How long before? Q. Yes; the first time she made that statement to you. A. Well, I don't remember that; I would like to tell it as near as I can remember. Q. But you know it was before the deed—you know it was before the deed was made? A. Yes; it was before the deed was made; then after the deed was made, Mr. Joe Harbinson, a wholesale liquor man in Sacramento, wrote me a letter, of course I can't read—he would have given me $2,500 cash for my property, and I laughed about it, and I said, 'Flossie,' or at least 'Lottie'—I got Flossie on the brain, no wonder—'Lottie, write a few lines to Mr. Harbinson and I will tell him what I will take for the property,' and she jumped up and she commenced cussing and swearing 'To hell with him, I don't want to sell it, I don't want to sell it,' says I, 'If he gives me what I ask for it, isn't that satisfactory?' 'No; I won't sell it.' I says, 'Write a few lines anyhow.' 'No.' Wouldn't do it. * * * Q. When this statement was made to you about making the deed to one person only did you make any statement to your daughter about the fact that you might want to sell this property? A. Yes. Q. What did you say to her in regard to that matter? A. I told her I would like to sell it; she said I could sell it any time I liked because I was pretty sharp on a bargain. Q. I will ask leave to ask this question though it is leading. Did you say to her, 'I said I didn't like to deed it because then I can't sell it?' A. Yes, sir; that is what I am coming at, and she said, 'Yes,' I could. Q. She stated, 'Yes,' you could? A. Yes. Q. Did you believe that statement she made to you. A. Well, I never dealt much with buying and selling, of course. Q. What I mean is this, did you rely on the statement she made to you? A. Certainly. Q. Believed it? A. Certainly; I thought she meant what she said at the time; if I didn't I wouldn't have done it. Q. Was the getting of an attorney to fix up the deed mentioned? A. She says she get Mr. Bell, he was a good hand to do anything like that because he done all the work for her husband when his mother died, and he understood it thoroughly, so Mr. Bell did do it. Q. Did you still believe and rely on those statements when you signed that deed? A. Yes, sir; I believed what she told me; I believed she thought she was telling what she meant."

Mrs. Soule, wife of Charles, with whom plaintiff lived after the death of his wife, testified:

"Q. Do you know whether while the old gentleman was living there in the town of Washington, he was worried or grieved? A. He grieved all the time; every minute of his life he grieved from the time he would get up, over his wife's death, and being left without his baby, as he called Flossie."

She testified to his being kept in a dark room on account of his eyes—

"he was suffering terrible day and night, got up at all hours of the night; that was just before he went to Rutherford. * * * Q. Did any one coming from Rutherford make any requests that he go down there? A. Yes; Flossie came for him, begged him to go down to mother, when he was sick, begged him, says, 'Mam told me to tell you to come, come down to her, that is the place,' he said, 'No; I don't want to go; I want to stay here,' nobody could take care of him like Madge; he imagined I could take care of his eyes because I had been doing it, I guess. Q. Did you have any talk with Lottie M. Wyatt about the time of his going down there? A. Oh, yes; she would talk—the time when she came to get him after he went down for the short visit then she came up to take his things down. Q. Did you have any talk with her, particularly with reference to any dealings she might have with him, what she might accomplish with him? A. She was talking to me, she said, 'They think they are going to get it all, but wait until I get him down there, you bet I'll get it.' Q. When was it she said that to you? A. When they were taking the furniture, the day before. Q. Did she ever say anything to you about any particularly scientific way of handling the old gentleman? A. No; only just when the other daughter was talking to him; they were fussing; she said, 'You can't ruffle his feathers; you have to smooth him down the right way and you can do anything you want with him.' Q. She said that to you? A. Yes. Q. In the town of Washington? A. Yes. Q. Before he went down there to live? A. Yes; when he was getting ready to go. Q. Did the old gentleman in his talks with you ever make any statement before he went down there as to the way in which he wanted to leave his property? A. It seemed like that was on his mind all the time; yes, he wanted share and share alike, 'They are all my children.' Q. Did they write any letters to Washington asking him to come down there? A. Yes; she wrote about every day when he was so bad, begged him to come down."

On cross-examination she testified:

"Q. Didn't you tell any one she had told you this? A. No; they all seemed—I wasn't interested in it; it was nothing to me; they never took me much into their affairs; she was talking to me in bed; she wanted to know if father would give Charlie anything—'what do you think he would do with it?' I says, 'I don't know.' She says, 'I bet if he did give him anything he would blow it in.' I says, 'I don't know.' She says, 'I'll tell you what I think he would do, he would take a long trip.' Q. She said if she got him down to Rutherford she would have it all? A. She was speaking of the other two; she said they wanted it, the other two, the daughter and son, they wanted it because they helped make it—'If he lives a week after I get him, I'll see they don't get it.'"

A letter written by defendant Mrs. Wyatt was identified by the witness. This letter was addressed to "Charles C. Soule, Broderick, Yolo Co., Cal.," also postmarked Broderick. It was dated three days after the deed in question was executed and was as follows:

"burn this. Rutherford, Aug. 2, 1912. Dear Brother: I just received you most welcome letter. We are always glad to hear from you. When you hear about the deeds just say Lot said she thought she would bye it as it was her old home."

A fragment of another letter written by defendant Mrs. Wyatt to Charles Soule read:

"He thinks he will come home sunday I sent the picture to him so his Polly can have it to look at I fixed Pa room up and it looks fine he eats good and sleeps good well Kid I don't know what could be rong with my last letter you say you don't understand it I told you he deeded it to me at least I intended to tell you so I know you must feel lonesome at time not seeing mother or father there but Father can go there to see you but our dear old mother we must give up we cant have her any more in this life I would not be suprised to see John and Annie try to brake the deeds but they will have a hard time doing it they would have to prove Pa was not in his right mind when he did it that would have to be done here so I am not afraid of it now if you dont come sunday why write and tell us the news love to you both Your loveing sister Lottie."

It appeared that plaintiff went to Napa with Flossie on July 3d and returned with her mother after the 4th, when they packed the furniture and returned shortly afterwards to Rutherford. The deed, as we have seen, was executed on July 30th. As to the circumstances attending the execution of the deed plaintiff testified:

"Q. Who accompanied you to Mr. Bell's office, when you went there; who went with you? A. Her husband, Harry Wyatt. Q. How did you get up the steps? A. She and him went together; he took me by the arm; helped me upstairs and downstairs through a hall; that is all I can remember about it. Q. At this time did you have anything over your eyes? A. Yes, sir. Q. What? A. I had my specs, I had a shade, and I had the rim of my hat over my eyes because the light bothered me a good deal. I got the same shade now at home. Q. Tell us as near as you can remember what occurred in Mr. Bell's office. A. Well, as near as I can remember, come there, says I come there to make a deed out, deed my property over to my daughter; of course, Mr. Bell knewed it, it was all understood beforehand, him being there, talked about it, had to go get Mr. Bell, ready to attend to business. Mr. Bell: I move to strike out what Mr. Bell knew. Mr. Clark: We consent. The Court: Stricken out. Mr. Clark: Q. Was the deed made out when you got there or made out afterwards, do you know? A. Made right away, right there while we were there. Q. Do you remember whether it was read over to you? A. Read over to me? Q. Yes. A. No, sir; I don't remember any such thing. I didn't know it was sold for $10; that was never mentioned to me. If they did I think I would have kicked; I would have thought there was something kind of funny. Q. did you sign your own name? A. Yes; I signed it myself; I made a cross with a pen. Q. What was done with the deed afterwards? A. Well, as near as I can remember, I think Mr. Bell kept it and sent it to Woodland to get it recorded; I think that is about the way it went. Q. Did you know it was going to be recorded at the time? A. I know it was going to be recorded; yes, sir."

He testified further:

"Q. What was the manner of their treatment towards you, Mr. Soule, before you made this deed, the family; what way were you treated in the Wyatt family before you made this deed? A. The reason I didn't what? Q. What was the manner of their conduct towards you before you made this deed; how did they treat you when you were down there? A. They treat me very kind; they couldn't do enough for me; treat me very kind; very kind indeed; I felt so sick I was like a child; you take a child if he sick you pet it, make over it, that is just what he likes, that is just like me. Q. How far was the little room you slept in from the house? A. The room I slept in joined the saloon, I should judge about 15 feet from the house, about that. Q. How was it about calling you to your meals, before the deed was made? A. The bell would ring; I didn't very often hear the bell; I am a little hard of hearing, but they tell me, we go along like two good friends so with us, open the screen door, open the other door, I go in ahead of him, he come in behind, shut it, sit down at the table, he wait on me, everything I had nice. Q. How was their treatment of you after the deed was made? A. Well, I commenced thinking that things didn't go quite so sociable didn't look exactly right—"Did you hear the bell? "No; I didn't hear it." "Well, dinner ready. Aint you going?" "I be there pretty soon." Some time he go when I did, sometime he didn't. When I got in the house his wife waited on me; I see he knocked off waiting on me; I thought it kind of funny; I thought all that but said nothing, but I noticed it. I was getting quite smart at that time, wasn't quite so sick; I was noticing things a little mite more. Q. How did you spend your time over there? A. Sitting in front of the saloon. I was figurehead for the saloon, had nowhere else to stay unless I stay in the house. Q. The saloon was a short distance from the house? A. Saloon just about—the front door of the saloon and the front door of the house was about 60 or 70 feet off, say 60 or 70 feet from the saloon door. Q. Mr. Wyatt was running this saloon there? A. Mr. Wyatt was running this saloon there. Q. Your room was built on to the saloon? A. My room was built on to the saloon one door open into the saloon, and one door open out in the back yard, one door open out in the street, three doors to the room. Q. Before the deed was made would they read to you? A. Well, I used to buy a paper called the Yolo Independent; I didn't buy it for me, bought it for my granddaughter; she wanted to hear the news from home where she was brought up and so on, but I wanted to hear the news, and they took the Bee, and they used to read the news right away as soon as they would get it, and I was anxious to have it read, but somehow or other afterwards, they were not so anxious to read it to me, 'I aint got time now, Pa.' 'I seen so and so happened in Washington.' 'Where did you see that?' 'I saw it in the paper.' 'Why didn't you read it to me last night?' 'I seen it since,' and that is all I know about it. Q. Did you ever suggest to them that they read to you? A. I used to ask them; yes, sir. Q. Was this expression ever used, 'Oh, to hell with you, I haven't time to read the paper'? A. No; she didn't say, 'To hell with me.' Q. What did she say? A. 'Oh, to hell with the paper, I aint got time to read it.' Q. That was after the deed was made? A. After the deed was made. Q. How about writing for you? A. My son-in-law, when he go anywhere, always very kind to ask me to go with him; sometimes I go, sometimes I didn't, but I don't remember—he might—but I don't remember him asking me to take a ride with him after the deed was made. Q. I mean writing, how about their writing for you? A. Why, she wouldn't write for me. Q. What did she say? A. One time they were raising the old Harry in Washington, the West Land Company made a fence on the line—my boy was running the house; he keeps writing down, so I says to my daughter one night, I says, 'Lot, write me a few lines to Charley and tell him to put the fence where it belongs; let him put it himself and take the fence there; that is mine; I bought it; that will do for firewood.' She jumped up and threw up her hands and cussed and God-damned—"God damn the place, I wish I never seen it; it is a damned bother to me; write to Charley, write to Charley; I am God damned tired writing, writing." I said, 'Well, I says, 'for God's sake, did your mother learn you that?' 'I don't give a God damn; all I can hear is write to Charley, write to Charley; I am going to sell the damned place.' 'Well, I says, 'if you don't want it, if it is a bother to you, give it back to me.' 'Not by a God damned sight; what am I going to have for taking care of you?' I says, 'It never cost you anything; you needn't take care of me; I can take care of myself or the county hospital can, but the place never cost you a nickel and you know it.' I paid all the taxes on that place since I owned it, up to this year, up to date."

There is but little if any conflict as to the physical condition of plaintiff prior to and after his wife's death and the making of the deed. There is no direct testimony that he was so weak-minded as to be incapable of understanding such a transaction as that of conveying his property to another, except as such an inference might be indulged from his physical and mental sufferings as testified to by many witnesses. Attorney Bell testified that plaintiff came to his office with defendants unsolicited by him. He had been attorney for defendant Harry Wyatt, but had never before seen plaintiff. Defendant Harry Wyatt telephoned him that plaintiff wanted him to transact some business and was told to bring him to witness' office, which defendants did in the afternoon of July 30th. Witness testified that plaintiff was introduced to him by defendants, and he thereupon stated his business, which was that he wanted to convey his property to Mrs. Wyatt; that witness explained to him fully what a deed meant and that if he signed it he would lose all control of the property; that he had no form of gift deed and used the ordinary bargain and sale form; that he asked plaintiff if he knew what he was doing, if he had any other children and what other property he had; that plaintiff told him he wanted to give the property to Mrs. Wyatt; that he said he could not write but he touched the pen and Mr. Bell and a clerk in an adjoining office witnessed the signature. He testified:

"I said to Mr. Soule, 'What do you want done with the deed, Mr. Soule?' He says, 'I want you to give it to Lottie, my daughter.' She was still sitting here at the corner of the desk. I reached it over to her. She says to him, 'Do you want me to record this, Pa?' something to that effect. He said, 'Yes, I do.'"

Mr. Bell had the deed recorded and later sent it to Mrs. Wyatt. Plaintiff testified that he had no recollection definitely of what took place at Mr. Bell's office except as shown above. There is nothing in the record to cast doubt upon the truthfulness of Mr. Bell's testimony. It is quite conceivable, however, that plaintiff did not fully comprehend the effect of what he was doing and was not impressed by what was told him. His understanding was, as he testified, that he was not parting with control of the property or with the title, and that he knew nothing to the contrary until some time after the deed was made when his daughter claimed to own the property. He received one offer for the lot by letter and spoke to his daughter about selling it and was then told it belonged to her and he could not sell it. This was all the property he had and he repeatedly expressed his desire that his children should share it equally.

Appellants rely upon Soberantes v. Soberantes, 97 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 910, "in which," it is claimed, "the circumstantial facts are almost identical with those in the instant case." The court said in that case, among other things:

"The transfer of an aged mother, by way of gift, of all her estate to one of her sons, to the exclusion of all her other children, will not be set aside as constructively fraudulent, where it appears that the gift was made freely and voluntarily, and with full knowledge of all the facts and comprehension of the nature and effect of the transfer, and in the execution of a purpose long entertained by her, originating in a desire to show her appreciation of the son's devotion and services, and without any undue influence or fraud upon his part, although, by reason of her illiteracy and want of experience and knowledge of business affairs, she was not able, unassisted, to take care of her property, and by reason thereof was liable to be deceived and imposed upon by designing persons in the transaction of her business."
